suggests a short pudgy personage behind a quaint old china pipe with a long stem which rests placidly on that portion of his anatomy which from its rotund prominence would warrant the naming of a giant watermelon or a mammoth pumpkin after him rather than an attenuated old shell fish. Besides, the name is in no way fishy—it smacks of beer and pretzels, sauer kraut and limburger. The other name is Nihilistic—it causes the Russian police wakeful nights, and to nose around for bombs and other illegal fireworks and things, and disturbs even the digestion and dreams of a Czar. Nothing in either name suggests anything Roman from the time of the rape of the Sabines to that of Romulus Augustulus. Nevertheless both names must be Latinized "for scientific purposes" and our noted old trilobite becomes Schmidt-ia-Mick-witz-i.* What would Dan O'Connell have given to have been able to call the belligerent old fish-woman a Schmidtia Mickwizi instead of a simple rectangular parallelopipedon?

Mickwitz's Mickst Metaphor

"Schmidtia Mickwizi!" is not that a name to awaken wrath—imagine some "scientific gent" instead of applying that epithet to a poor old dead and gone shell fish, with no representative this side the carboniferous era to resent it, calling some husky son of Erin a Schmidtia-Mickwizi! The "chunk of old red sandstone" which was heaved so successfully in the cause of resenting family insults on the Stanislaus would again be called into use and scientists would be gently admonished to be more particular in using such names.

It is not now possible to determine why one of these names should have been chosen for the given and the other for the surname of this trilobite, why he was called Schmidtia-Mickwizi instead of Mickwitz-ia Schmidt or Mick-schmidtia Witz-i or Wick-Schmidtia Micki, but probably these permutations and combinations are reserved for distinguished members of the trilobite family who may be found worthy of these honors.

But that name will stick to that old shell fish. Whatever may have been the grandeur with which he swam the silurian seas, he is a Schmidtia-Mickwizi to the end of time, unless this so-called scientific mode of naming gets the oblivion it deserves.

Can there be any further doubt that this new disease is spreading to a dangerous extent. That hospitals are needed where mild and curable cases can be treated, and asylums where chronic cases can be safely isolated?

The Horrible Effects

Think of grafting Latin and Greek terminals upon Dutch, Polish, Siwash, Japanese and Tahitian names and turning these names loose upon impressionable and defenceless youth and upon the grammar of the English language, disguised as true science! Think of teaching youthful minds in the search of truth that such names are necessary and scientific! Think of admitting that the scientific minds of the twentieth century are so lame and feeble in their powers of expressing thought and of properly describing the things they see that they have to use such worse than doggerel! Think of the silliness of using such jargon in the place of our mother tongue, which if used rightly can express thought in fewer, stronger, clearer words than any other ever spoken or written!

"Those to whom English is the mother tongue should use it rather than any other. It is strong and clear enough when well written or spoken to set forth any thoughts we may have." When one has anything that is worth saying, it can be said better and in fewer words in English than in any other tongue, and the closer he can follow the rules of pure English the better. But, if his ideas are weak and his thoughts hazy, or if he wants to write on a little subject in a seemingly scientific and ponderous way it is well to pad and bolster up his writings with mongrel words of ancient lineage. This style impresses the casual reader with wonderful ideas of the writer's learning, but when analyzed means but little, and that little of such slight moment that it might be left unsaid without serious loss to science. It is true that in certain lines of scientific research words built up from foreign roots or derived from other languages are necessary and can be used with propriety and elegance when their places cannot be filled with Anglo-Saxon words of broader and stronger meaning. There are a large number of foreign derived words of good and respectable standing which have enriched our language and which we could not do without—but these have been chosen with better taste and judgment than have been used in coining some of more recent mintage. But the fashion to rush into word building on the slightest opportunity has been led by scientists and followed by druggists, soap makers and so forth until the fashion has developed into a disease. This disease has become necessary to prescribe for and treat carefully lest it attack the roots of our mother tongue.

Treatment of the Disease

The treatment in severe cases must be gentle, yet firm. Some of the afflicted ones are so used to the delusion that they know more than they really do, that fatal results may follow if too suddenly deprived of this delusion. The windy nature of the words they use has given them inflated ideas of their knowledge and too sudden a change to words that actually mean something might shock them too severely. Many of them may be cured and become really useful members of scientific and literary circles. But the treatment which will best check this new disease is:

To teach the children and youth of this country:

1st. That to master their mother tongue is far better than to get a smattering of other languages.

2d. That strong, clear thought can best be expressed in pure Anglo-Saxon.

3d. That when one has really produced an original thought or has discovered something actually new which requires a new name to correctly define it to search well the roots and powers of his mother tongue before searching elsewhere.

Oscar, the famous chef of the Waldorf-Astoria, has a fad for the collection of menus and he has at the present time about 2,000, which it has taken him twenty years to collect. There are cards of dinners given in China and in Persia, dinners in fact in all parts of the civilized world, by societies, to individuals, to commemorate national and personal events. There is a menu of the Thirteen Club printed on black pasteboard in the shape of a coffin and ornamented with skulls, and the menu of a railroad club in the form of a coupon, each division of which entitles the holder to a certain dish and the whole taking him the entire journey from appetizer to coffee.

W. D. Nichols of the Oakland Chamber of Commerce, according to St. Nicholas, has a process by which he is able to preserve flowers for a long time without losing their form or color. One of his exhibits is what is known as the McKinley lily. A large lily was placed in a glass jar with the preserving fluid, and after several weeks its petals began to droop a little. A visitor noticed the resemblance to the features of the late President of the United States, William McKinley, when looked at from a particular point of view, and the flower has since been called the McKinley lily. Every effort is being made to keep it in existence in its present state as long as possible, as it has proved a great attraction and object of interest to visitors.

A teacher in one of the Newton lower grade schools was entertaining two visitors in the class-room. Several days previously the teacher had furnished amusement and at the same time increased the children's store of knowledge by a series of questions of the following nature: "What do we sit on that rhymes with hair?" Some child would answer "chair." The visitors would be pleased to observe how readily the pupils could answer. "What do I wear on my head that rhymes with cat?" asked the instructress. Up went the hand of a boy with red hair. "Well, Johnny," said she, "you may tell us." Johnny arose, and appeared frightened. "It's a rat," he blurted. And then the tableau.—Boston Post.

There had been a family row. "Well," remarked the alleged head of the house, "a man learns a few things when he gets married. Yes, sir, a man lives and learns." "That may be," retorted the feminine half of the sketch, "but the school of experience doesn't bar coeds."—Baltimore American.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The National Guard

The National Guard of California, as explained last week, is the "active" militia of the state and subject to duty before the reserve forces can be called out. The law provides for not to exceed 84 companies for California, part of which may be infantry and part coast artillery, cavalry, signal corps, etc. The infantry is organized into regiments of 12 companies each.

But California's limit of active militia is by no means reached. At present it consists of 2 companies of signal corps, 9 companies of coast artillery, 3 troops of cavalry, 36 companies of infantry and 8 divisions of naval militia. The law does not provide for regiments of cavalry in California, but only for 4 troops, the 4 troops constituting a squadron. Neither is the coast artillery organized into regiments, but constitutes a corps under the command of a Chief of Artillery who has the rank of colonel.

The minimum strength of an infantry company, in order to maintain an organization, is three commissioned officers and 58 enlisted men. The maximum is three commissioned officers and 82 enlisted men. The minimum is prescribed by the War Department at Washington, the maximum by the governor of the state.

When the infantry is organized into a regiment there must be 12 companies and, in all, 15 commissioned officers and 4 medical officers, making 19 for field and staff. Add to these the three commissioned officers of each of the twelve companies and we have a total of 55 commissioned officers for the regiment.

The total strength of California's "active" militia at this writing is 3284 officers and men. If the maximum number of companies were organized and fully manned the strength of the National Guard of California would be 7,482 to 7,515, depending upon whether all were organized as infantry or a portion as cavalry, coast artillery, etc.

It is not a bad thing for a young man to become a member of the National Guard. The discipline of a soldier is a good experience to have undergone and the drilling necessary to bring a company up to standard requirement does much for the physique and carriage of a man, and, too, the state may need the services of men who have not lost the fighting edge as certainly as a city may need the services of policemen.

The requirements for enlistment in the National Guard in California are, that the applicant must be a male citizen of the United States, at least 18 years of age and not older than 45 and physically sound. Musicians and trumpeters may be enlisted as young as 16, but all under 18 must first have the consent of parents or guardian. The first enlistment must be for three years, re-enlistments for one, two or three years, at the option of the applicant.

For officers above the regimental there are, beside the governor, who is commander-in-chief, the Adjutant-General, with the grade of brigadier general, really the executive officer of the National Guard, and a brigade commander, also with the rank of brigadier general.

A good deal of business comes to the office of the Adjutant General even in piping times of peace, and to assist him in carrying it on he requires quite an office force. He has an assistant, a chief clerk and two record clerks, a property and financial clerk, a stenographer and an armorer and porter, and, what with inspecting companies scattered over the state and settling military squabbles of one sort or another, and trying to keep the fighting arm of government fit to do service if the needs of the state should demand it, the office of Adjutant General is no sinecure.

To meet the expenses of the military arm of government the legislature of 1909 appropriated $386,660 for the two years ending June 30, 1910 and June 30, 1911. To this fund the national government adds about $100,000 a year, in consideration for which expenditure, devoted to arming, equipping and clothing the National Guard, the national government has the right to call out and muster into its own service such guard, for a term specified in the call, in advance of any volunteer force, and to require it to go wherever the exigencies of national welfare make it necessary, even to the invasion of foreign territory. This relates to the "organized and uniformed" National Guard and not to the unorganized militia.

To this end the national government appropriates $2,000,000 a year to be divided among all the states and the District of Columbia, or so much of it as is needed, but no state can participate in this fund unless it maintains an organized and uniformed National Guard equal to 100 men for each senator and representative in congress from such state. This would require California, for instance, to have 1,000 enlisted men, whereas it has more than 3,000.

Thus spake the dude unto the maid: "I trust you'll excuse my plight; my talk will bore you, I'm afraid, for I feel like a fool tonight." Thus spake the maid unto the dude: "That's all right, but pray—pardon me if I'm seemingly rude—don't you always feel that way?"—Chicago News.

Brown had married the prettiest woman in the town and Green had married the homeliest, but thought she was a beauty. One evening they met and the conversation having drifted to their respective better halves, Green remarked: "I say, Brown, I think you and I married the two handsomest women in the village." Brown looked at him in surprise a moment, but seeing he was serious, replied cautiously, and with pride: "Well, old man, I guess you are about half right." But Green didn't see the point until he told his wife and she began to make a few remarks.—Chicago News.

"During the past ten years a new profession has come into existence—that of the BUSINESS DOCTOR. Today, when a corporation shows signs of debility, experts are called in from the outside to make a searching examination of the patient and prescribe treatment. Private business has thrown soothing syrups and home cure-all out of the window and is applying scientific methods to the treatment of its troubles." (The Saturday Evening Post.)

What Everybody Knows

THERE ARE FACTS that will never be written into the record of any court, or proved by human testimony, that everybody knows as well as any human fact can be known. Everybody knows that Calhoun and his associates are guilty as charged; that to save themselves from prison they have debauched the press of San Francisco, the public mind, the social life, the electorate; that the defeating of Heney was with the expectation that the graft prosecutions would be abandoned by The People; that the conduct of the District Attorney's office has not been inconsistent with that expectation; that the dynamiting of the house in which Gallagher was, and the houses which he owned, was as much a part of the general scheme of defense, including Ruef, as bribery had been a part of the general scheme of securing franchises and increases of tolls from the city and the inhabitants thereof; that the disappearance of Gallagher was accomplished either through terrorism or bribery, or by terrorism and bribery combined. In view of these facts, which everybody knows, and probably nobody can prove, is there any wonder that Judge W. P. Lawlor, a righteous and just judge, set the whole matter forth, taking the people into his confidence? Remember that this judge has spent years in hearing the evidence in these cases; that he knows the defendants to be guilty; that he has been forced to sit powerless while this game of bluff was put through to its miserable end. Is there any wonder that he keeps the grip of the law upon these felons, self-confessed, inasmuch as they have not dared to take the witness stand for their own exculpation, in the hope that some circumstance, fortuitous perhaps, may yet give justice a chance to be vindicated? For this the defendant and his attorneys, in a fine humbuggery of indignation, claim the right to abuse the court as they might abuse a pickpocket! Five days in jail! Five years would scarcely suffice to vindicate an outraged judicial dignity. Is it any wonder that the President declared the administration of criminal justice in this country a disgrace to our civilization? And where in all civilization will a more disgraceful example of it be found than the graft cases of San Francisco afford? Cling to those culprits, Judge Lawlor, to the latest day you may. Some guilty soul among them, in greater fear of the wrath of an outraged God than of prison bars, may be moved through remorse to lay the whole abominable business bare.

Agony Nearly Over

THE STAFF MAKES NO APOLOGY for devoting the greater part of this issue to politics. If we did not the very stones would cry out. The Nation is watching. The grafters defeated San Francisco. Will the same ilk defeat the State of California? Not one sympathizer with the San Francisco grafters will vote for Johnson, and scarcely one who is fighting Johnson was anything else than a sympathizer with the grafters. It is the same fight carried to a larger field. It will go to the nation two years hence. Let every reader of this issue "carry its message to Garcia."

Not In Cold Storage

IT IS NOT TRUE that the National Forests of California are to be held in cold storage for the benefit of the East that, having destroyed its heritage, now seeks to hold our forests for a profit to the national treasury to the retarding of the development of this state. It is a plausible lie, but it is a lie. The Forest Service now has contracts for the sale of 200,000,000 board feet of timber in California, and the highest bidder for stumpage in the Trinity reserve will be allowed to cut one billion feet if he wishes to, but under conditions that will prevent monopoly, the ruining of the watersheds, waste of the timber, and that will insure a new growth to take the place of the old. Contrast this with the 2,000,000 acres (forty billion feet), held by T. B. Walker, who importunes the state to relieve his timber from taxation and refuses to allow one tree to be marketed. His holdings are worth $80,000,000, and yet he puts them in cold storage that they may be worth more. One-fourth of all that the Forest Service receives goes into the state treasury. All that Walker may receive will go into his pockets. Against private monopoly no word of protest is spoken by the hired knaves that are denouncing conservation.

Kent's Fences

THE GOLCONDA CATTLE COMPANY in Nevada has a line of fence that may run across some government land. The fence encloses nothing. The land is unsurveyed, and where the line runs the government does not know. The fence is open at certain places that cattle on other ranges may have free access to water. Its sole purpose is to deter other herds from mixing with those of the Golconda Cattle Company. The government's agent assented to the fence remaining there because it did no harm. It would have been taken away at any time upon demand. Suit was brought as a political coup, and its being brought was an outrage, but then Kent, with voice and pen, has fought Ballinger at every point. That's why.

Johnson Unafraid

MEN SAY OF HIRAM JOHNSON, "We like him. He is not afraid, in the name of a redeemable Israel, to go up against the Goliath of associated Rapacity." True, he is not, and yet we know that there has been small future at the bar, or in public life, for any man who has braved the vindictiveness of the plutocratic oligarchy that has governed California. Except Johnson win the victory he will have no end of time in which to count the cost of having made a losing fight. He knows it, and yet has dared to beard that giant in his cave. The greater glory to Johnson for his grit.

Is This Where the Flop Comes In?

RAILROAD EMPLOYEES IN CONCLAVE selecting candidates! The Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company having no part in it! It couldn't possibly! Then how comes it that endorsements go to Wagner, Mattison, Ferris, "organization" candidates all? And to Curry, the "organization" candidate in reserve? Is it here that the flop to Curry is to come in? Is it by this uprising of the railroad employes that the "Crockering" of Anderson is to be accomplished and accounted for? It squints that way. But the railroad employes are not chattels. Their use is to mask batteries. The saloon and tenderloin will do the voting.

HELP WANTED

The Lincoln-Roosevelt State Committee needs five or six thousand dollars the worst way in the world, with which to close up its campaign, hire the polls watched in certain precincts in San Francisco until the vote is all in and counted, for putting a copy of the state ticket into the hands of every voter in the state and for paying those who have done indispensable work for the indispensable work they have done and are doing. The having of this fund in hand may make all the difference between success and failure. Cannot the reader of this send $10 to Mr. Adolph Uhl, treasurer, 717 Kamm Building, San Francisco? That will pay for watching one polling place and secure an honest count therefrom. Here is a chance to help where help is wanted. The "organization" has money to burn.

Opening a Way Upward

Ill fares the state whose service offers no attractions for men of the first character to enter public life. That has been the condition of California since it came to be dominated by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. The test of fitness applied by that bureau is: "Will he take orders?" The man who will not take orders from the head of that bureau can be of small use to the bureau. The man who will take orders from the head of that bureau can be of small use to the state. If our ablest men have turned aside from public service it is because they could not bring themselves to kneel at the feet of the Southern Pacific autocrat that favor might be found in his sight. Hiram Johnson and his associates will perform no better service for the state than that of opening free ways to distinction, honor, office and those opportunities for usefulness that office affords, ways leading from all portions of the state to the state capital without going through the door of Mr. Herrin's private office. When the manhood of California shall have been made free to choose its own path to preferment California will enter upon a new era in its political history. Like Iowa and Wisconsin, Kansas and Nebraska, California will be represented at Washington by men whose names will become household words in every neighborhood in America. Is not that of itself well worth fighting for?

A Plain Issue in Plain Terms

There is no issue between Democrats and Republicans in this state this year, nor is there in any other state in the Union. The issue is between those who believe in a government of the people and those who, having no faith in such government, believe in a government of a plutocratic oligarchy.

This oligarchy entrenches itself predominantly in the Republican party in Republican states and in the Democratic party in Democratic states and, inasmuch as it furnishes the money for making campaigns, this is not difficult to accomplish. It also trains and maintains a reserve force in minority parties in all states, an easy thing to do because it furnishes campaign moneys for those parties, too.

If this plutocratic oligarchy were to promulgate a platform it would read something like this: "God made the many weak and few strong; government of the people is an iridescent dream never to come true; government must be by the strong alone and such as the interests of the strong require; if the strong get what they want they will make the wheels of industry hum, thereby furnishing work for the many weak and charity for the very weak; this condition is ordained of God, in mercy, and we, the strong, hold ourselves accountable to Him and to no other authority; laws are made by us, not for us, for we are law unto ourselves; only the weak need to be restrained, policed, regulated; given order, and security for property, we'll do the rest and all will be well with the world."

The spirit of democracy, which is the spirit of insurgency, of progressive Republicanism and progressive Democracy, wherever found and under whatever banner, denies the truth of the above platform in particular and entire; denies that the ability to grab is a true test of human strength; that the many, united, are weak; denies that government must be of the strong alone or in their interests, but rather of and for the many that they may be protected from the rapacities of the strong who hold themselves accountable to neither God nor man, but are themselves bond servants of an overmastering passion for power and authority; denies that, with special privilege abolished and free access to land afforded, there need be poverty in the world; denies that order is to be rated above justice or property above manhood, and affirms that democracy, in both government and industry, is the hope of humanity, a prophecy, not a dream.

Stated in plain terms that is the issue on which the battle of the 16th of August is to be fought. It will be only one of a thousand battles that have been fought on the same issue, and only one of a thousand other battles to be fought on the same issue hereafter. In truth "thousand" may well be multiplied a thousand times a thousand and then fall short of the battles that will have been fought before democracy will have made its victory final.

At the moment when this is being written government by plutocratic oligarchy is represented in the candidacy of Alden Anderson, in the foreground, with Charles F. Curry in reserve and Phil Stanton heading a scouting party making feints at strategic points. Their batteries are all masked, they fly false colors and are uniformed in the garb of the common people. Opposed to them is Hiram Johnson, fighting in the open, with banners flying, his staff about him, steadily, bravely, moving upon the enemy's works. He ought to win. He will win. He must win.

Tendencies of Taxation

Taxation is a dull subject. Only a few care to look into it and most of those only to ask how much and why so much, to go away grumbling that taxes ought to be less and would be but for those godless and irresponsible politicians who make governments what they are and charge inordinately for the service rendered. And yet taxation will never be less until the taxed give heed to the subject, and it is improbable that it will be less even then, although the taxpayers may get more for their money. The tendency of taxation is to take for the common good an ever increasing portion of the common earnings, not at all a bad tendency if only the common good gets it and human parasites do not.

In a recent article in the Sacramento Bee,

State Controller A. B. Nye, who has given the subject careful study, points out some not generally known facts in regard to the course of taxation here and abroad.

The cost of living of governments increases par. passu with the cost of living of the people under those governments. This is in obedience to a natural law, and governments have no power to stop where they are while other costs of living go on.

The cost of government in Europe increased at the rate of 100 per cent per century until the nineteenth century, during which it increased 500 per cent. This is as true of local governments as of national. In less than 100 years local governments in England increased 600 per cent and, while Paris was trebling its population, its local expenditures were multiplied by eight. While the communes of France were adding one-sixth to their population their taxes were increased six-fold, all in about sixty years.

Our own country is keeping pace with Europe. In 1800 our national expenditures were $1.50 per capita per annum, and now they are $7.50. In 1798 New York City spent $1.80 per capita on its local government, now it expends about $30 per year. In 1860 Boston had a per capita expenditure of $20, now it is $44.

Nor is California slow in taxing its people and in expending their substance. Eight years ago the state, counties, cities, towns and taxing districts of California raised and expended about $45,000,000 per year, now it is about $65,000,000, with a population of less than 2,000,000. State taxation is growing two and a half times as fast as population and county and city taxation more rapidly than state. Controller Nye is getting the finances of his state at his finger tips and, if continued in office, his fund of information will be of great service to California's taxed burden bearers.

Not all this increase of taxation is unrequited. Some of it is to be credited to better service, but when the average cost of policing American cities increases from $190 to $226, and of fire protection from $1.33 to $1.72, we are uncertain whether the increase in the first instance is to be charged to increase of crime or credited to better police protection; whether the second is to be charged to the imp of politics in the fire departments of cities or be credited to better protection from the fire fiend; but when the cost of our public schools increases from a per capita average of $3.69 to $4.70 we feel pretty sure that the children of the country are getting the benefit of the increase.

This paper believes in high taxes. It believes in taking for the common good as high a percentage of the net results of commerce and industry as may be taken without discouraging enterprise, crippling industry and hampering commerce; but it is the part of patriotism and civic efficiency to see to it that the common good gets a dollar's worth of service or other value for every dollar taken in taxes. With increase of taxation there is a tendency for spoliation to increase also. That must be watched, or it will work the impoverishment of any people.

Panics While You Wait

In the New York Times of July 24th, Mr. Rudolph Spreckels is reported as saying: "Next fall the large business interests, and the politicians controlled by them, are going to spring a sensation. This move will border on a panic. The people are all right themselves, but to influence them the capitalists will cause a national disturbance which will effect business materially."

It need surprise no one if Mr. Spreckels' prophecy shall be fulfilled. As more than one foreign war was precipitated to prevent a revolution at home, so more than one financial panic has been caused to stem a popular tide or to punish a presumptuous reform movement. These are hard things to say, but they are still harder things to do, and evidence is not wanting to show that they have been done.

Not long since Andrew Carnegie stated that, had he wanted more money, he could have cleared up fifty millions during the panic of 1907. If Carnegie could have done this it is altogether probable that J. Pierpont Morgan did do it. It was known and commented on before the panic that the Morgan interests had forty millions of cold cash to draw on before that panic was precipitated. It was known and commented on that the Harriman interests had borrowed vast sums on the credit of the Union Pacific for which no use had been found prior to that panic. When the panic came the Morgan and Standard Oil interests were given great credit for "sustaining" the market, which sustaining consisted in buying in securities that the panic forced the owners of those securities to sell for less than they were worth that they might be held until they could be sold for more than they were worth. Never was financial righteousness more promptly or more liberally rewarded in spot cash than when the Morgan and Rockefeller groups "came to the rescue of the market" in the fall of 1907.

It was popularly believed at the time that the panic was inflicted for the punishment of Roosevelt that his administration might go down in obloquy to defeat. That may have been its purpose, or that may have been an incident to a more proximate purpose of catching the Heinze crowd in a trap and skinning them to a finish. Whatever the purpose the panic of 1907 did not fortuitously happen. It was produced.

Now it is as easy to create a panic in Wall street as in a crowded theatre. In a crowded theatre it is only necessary to raise a lusty cry of fire. In Wall street it is only necessary to have a chain of banks call in call loans, refuse credit, throw a lot of securities on the market that can't be bought and start a bank run. J. Pierpont Morgan's men, allied with the Rockefeller interests, can do this any day in the year. It need surprise no one if they do it any day between now and November.

Those men are "standpatters." Mr. Morgan announced his satisfaction with Mr. Taft before he was elected, and no word of dissatisfaction has escaped him from that day to this. Those men are satisfied with Cannon and the House methods as they were. They have no use for insurgency or the leaders thereof. If a financial flurry, or panic of mild type, will aid in the election of standpat congressmen and legislators it will be forthcoming at the psychological moment. The prophecy of Mr. Sprechels will be fulfilled if the exigencies of the case require it. Meantime, it will be well for prudent folk to furl their financial sails sufficiently to enable them to stand a squall without danger of capsizing.

Chain the Dog, Loose the Fox

Something like eighty per cent of the registered vote of California is registered as Republican. Twenty-five per cent of that vote is not Republican. On the face of it this condition ought not to be, but in very truth it is exactly as it should be. Men should be so registered as to be able to fight where the fighting is. It is inconceivable how those who permitted the direct primary bill to become a law permitted it to be so liberal in this particular. A determined effort will be made at the next session of the legislature to curtail that liberty. The purpose of that effort will be to chain the watchdog while turning the fox loose in the poultry yard. There is no way of keeping a dishonest man on his own side of a party fence at a primary election. An honest voter may be bound by an oath, but to bind him while suffering the conscienceless to go free is to force him to stand a hand-tied non-combatant while scoundrelism assaults decency with impunity. What cannot be done should not be attempted. All should be left free to fight where there is a battle to be fought. If any change were made in the law it should be to abolish all restrictions with regard to party affiliations and leave all voters free to call for any ballot they want election morning. That would necessitate printing many superfluous ballots, but liberty is cheap even at that price. Thank fortune this fight is in a free field with no favors and no quarter asked or offered. May all fights that follow it be like unto it.

There Ought To Be a Difference

It is probable that Mississippi will insist on placing a statue of Jefferson Davis in Statuary Hall in the capitol at Washington, as Virginia did in the case of Robert E. Lee. Probably nothing can be done to prevent it. Perhaps nothing ought to be done to prevent it. There is no reason why Davis should be made the scapegoat of the Confederacy.

And yet, if we honor equally Lincoln and Davis, Grant and Lee, if we equally honor those who bravely sought to take the nation's life and those who bravely sought to preserve it, how shall the generations that are to come, and the millions who have come to our shores—how shall these learn to distinguish between that which was patriotic and that which was not? How shall they learn to place a just estimate upon the moral issues fought over, union and disunion, freedom and bondage?

The North was not without sin, as the South was not without extenuating conditions, but, after all concessions are mutually made that should be, was there not left a difference, a difference as wide as the continent and as profound as the depths of the ocean?

Forgiveness there ought to be, and forgetfulness, too, if there can be. It was well to "bind up the nation's wounds," and the "bloody shirt" era, that sought to keep those wounds open, was a miserable manifestation of a miserable spirit, but rests there any obligation, either human or divine, upon the men of this generation, to concede that there was no issue of right or wrong, of patriotism or treason, in a conflict that shook civilization, that involved a half million lives and billions of treasure?

If crime may be committed against a nation a crime was committed against this nation when Fort Sumter was fired on. That crime was expiated. It has been forgiven. The captured battle flags were properly returned to those from whom they were taken. The hand of fellowship was long since taken across Mason and Dixon's line. The sons of veterans, in blue and gray, have fought side by side under the banner of a common country. Sons of Union veterans and daughters of the Confederacy have joined their hands and hearts in holy matrimony. Not one thing should be said or done to open old wounds or renew old animosities, but unhappy will it be for the Great Republic if Appomattox shall ever mean less to its children than Salamis meant to the Greeks, than Runnymede, for seven hundred years, has meant to the English speaking races, than the Fall of the Bastille means to France.

Some way should be found, "with charity for all and malice toward none," for preserving the power for determining the right from the wrong in a controversy that convulsed a continent, and that way does not lie in the direction of filling our national Valhalla with heroic statuary, placing those who fought to save their country's life vis-a-vis with those who sought to take it. It were better to convert all the statuary into building mortar and turn Statuary Hall into a handball court.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Do bad men realize that they are bad? Do men who stand for wrong things know that they are standing for wrong things, and are they doing it with premeditation and aforethought?

Yes, sometimes. Sometimes men choose the evil part deliberately, because they believe that it will be profitable for them to do it, but in most instances they find ways of persuading themselves that it is right, in their particular cases, for them to do wrong, than which nothing is easier, or else they follow inclination heedless of right or wrong.

It would be difficult to teach a wolf that it is wrong for him to kill sheep. It is not wrong for a wolf to kill a sheep to satisfy his craving for food, for the god of the wolf made him a wolf to that end, but it would be hard to make a wolf understand that it was wrong for him to kill as many sheep as he can in a flock through very lust of killing. There is nothing in the wolf nature to prevent his following his lusts unhindered.

There is little to show that animals are ever harassed by uncertainty as to what is right and what is wrong. They follow their instincts wherever they lead and, by and by, fall a prey to like instincts in other animals, for the death of every wild animal is a tragedy.

If we look out upon the world of men and women we find that they, too, are mainly following their instincts wherever they lead. They eat when they are hungry and drink when they are thirsty with little heed to consequences to themselves or to others. Their passions go unbridled, they follow a single line of interest to the shutting out of all other avenues of utility or pleasure, "putting it through," one thing after another, until they are dead. Life, to such persons, is intoxication.

There are times that come to most of us when we envy such persons their irresponsibility, when we envy the wolf, which always knows what to do next, and the birds, whose way is clear from daylight until dark. This thing of being a responsible human being, answerable for every step we take, making choice one way or other every waking moment, responsible even for the thoughts we think, for the lusts we cherish, for wishing to do the things we do not do—this free, moral agency of ours—where else shall we find such a burden as that?

The slave had small concern to know where-withal he was to be fed and clothed. The employe, content always to be an employe, and to receive his weekly stipend in his little envelope, is exempt from the anxiety of the employe who must somehow make his business prosperous that he may pay those who work for him. With every step from the lower walks of life to the higher, and with every stage from bond to free, there come added burdens of responsibility, and so on until, having reached the highest levels, one may drift no longer. The President, for instance, as one of the penalties of being President, must weigh every word before it is spoken, consider every act before he acts it, look well to every shrug of his shoulders, wink of his eye, and yet there are many ready enough to assume all these burdens for the sake of being President.

Responsibility for our acts, whether good or evil, is the price which humans must pay for being humans. Is it not, after all, well worth the price? Is it unreasonable to suppose that somewhere, some time, we shall each of us be called upon to give an account of that stewardship? The wise and good in all ages of the world have lived and died believing that the deeds done in the body will be judged. And what shall be that judgment in the case of one who, endowed as are the gods, lived as do the animals, following instincts and the directions of least resistance from cradle to grave? Will it not be more tolerable on that day for Sodom and Gomorrah than for such an one? And did not Sodom and Gomorrah make for themselves names eternally infamous by following their instincts unhindered?

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Our Taxation By Railroads

In recent years practically constant attempts have been made to secure a certain degree of governmental control of railroads and railroad fares, and these attempts have met a moderate amount of success. How essential they have been, and still are, to a people who do not believe in taxation without representation recent statistics indicate. According to these statistics the gross earnings of railroads in the United States in the year terminating June 30, 1910, amounted to about $2,845,000,000. Now pause to consider what this sum means. Supposing that the United States has 90,000,000 inhabitants, it would be an average assessment of $31.61 on each man, woman and child of them all. Until recently, at any rate, the railroads have had the power to raise or lower rates practically at their own will, and their will, except in cases of "playing favorites," generally has been to raise; almost without let or hindrance they have, as they chose, given the producers of the country profit or loss on their wares. What such a power meant will be realized when it is seen that if they now were no more handicapped by law than they were not long ago, and chose to raise their gross earnings just one per cent, it would mean an increase of $28,450,000 in the people's railroad tax. Are not such figures sufficiently convincing that it was time to put the brake of the law on the railroad engine, and do they not suggest that that brake is as yet none too strenuous in its operation? Naturally the railroads would prefer uncontrolled action, but it is submitted that the people have given it to them all too long for their own good.

Our Modern Cliff-Dwellers

Perhaps we have been wasting sympathy all this time on those ancient cliff-dwellers; perhaps their condition, in comparison with ours, was not so forlorn as we have thought. To be sure, they lived in holes in the rocks, but generally the other side of the street was a long way off, they had plenty of light and air, and archeologists admit that their rents were not high. Now compare their lot with that of the modern cliff-dwellers in our large cities. There our cliff-dweller enters his cave through the hole in front, and for a time the light more and more brokenly follows him. Soon, however, he enters the caverns of gloom in the center of the cave where there is practically no light save artificial and where the atmosphere has been worn out by too long continued service. Now, listen: According to latest reports, more than three millions of New York's over four millions of inhabitants live in caves the peculiarities of which are not greatly exaggerated in the foregoing description. In recent years more or less systematic attempts have been made to improve the light and ventilation in many of these caves, but statistics show further that in cases where this has been done the rent has been increased 200 per cent. In New York City people have to pay high for such luxuries as light and air, and there are parts of the great metropolis where the residents never have enough. On the whole, looking on some features of modern existence, it appears that it must have been a merry, merry life which the ancient cave-dweller knew.

Teaching Foreigners To Talk English

Peter Roberts is the name of the immigration secretary of the international Young Men's Christian Association; and Peter Roberts is a man who is subject to practical, helpful ideas. Among such ideas, it occurred to him that what foreigners who come to this country to live need is, not so much a knowledge of English grammar or rhetoric, as it is knowledge of English words in common use and what those words mean. This idea having occurred to him, he put it to practical service by starting schools for teaching "English as she is spoke" in principal cities throughout the country. These schools are free, and in them the pupils, of all ages and varieties, are taught words by showing them the things or the acts which those words represent. For example, the teacher may close his eyes and announce that he is asleep; whereupon the class says "asleep" over and over, and absorbs the idea. Then, let us say, he opens his eyes and says that he is awake, and a similar process is repeated. This indicates the manner in which words for common acts are taught, and of course the names of things are even easier to acquire. The words and expressions in most common use are the ones that are taught, and the practical value of such teaching must be evident to everybody.

Warships' Profit and Loss Account

The profit and loss account in connection with United States naval vessels makes a rather neat item. It has averaged almost a million dollars annually during the last ten years. In that time thirty-six of these vessels have been consigned to the national junk heap, and they cost our government $9,803,495.90. An interesting collection to lie on the scrap-pile back of Uncle Sam's woodshed, was it not? But it should not be supposed that the entire sum expended on the collection was dead loss. No, for 32 of the vessels were sold at auction. Among these the steel converted yacht Hornet quite glittered as it sold for $5,100, which was 4 1-3 per cent of its original cost of $117,500, whereas the average return on the lot was less than 2 3/4 per cent. There is a certain element of pathos involved in digging in a scrap heap for that which was purchased at the price of labor and the sweat of man's brow, but the pathos is emphasized by the reflection that that which was purchased and thrown away was intended for something desired by no one and of injury only to mankind.

Madgeburg Advertises For a Mayor

They do things differently over in Germany. Witness the case of Madgeburg. Madgeburg is a city of about 350,000 inhabitants; not quite so large as San Francisco, but nearly enough so to make comparisons odious if they point in the wrong direction. Recently the chief burgomaster (practically the same as our mayor) of the city was appointed Prussian minister of finance, and this left his city office unoccupied. What do you suppose the people of Madgeburg did then? Did they sit quietly by while the professional politicians went to the professional boss in order to learn whom he would permit the people to vote for for the office, as has been our blessed wont in this country? Nothing of the sort. They advertised in the newspapers for a man competent to occupy the office, at the same time announcing that its salary was $5,250 a year, with residence and $1,000 a year for social entertainment added. That is the German way of doing it. Advertise in a similar way here, and gatling guns could not check the mob pointed for the mayor's office. The distinction is born of the fact that the Germans make a profession of holding the mayor's office; here, as everybody knows, we have been accustomed to make a soft snap of it. There the incumbent must be competent to serve the people; here he must be competent to trade favors with the boss. There the office honors the holder, and he is expected to honor it; here it is only prima facie evidence of guilt, which may be overcome by direct evidence. Curious about the Germans! They act as if they suspected that human intelligence might as well be applied to politics as to anything else.

Coins For International Use

It is only the traveler in foreign lands who will thoroughly appreciate the importance of a topic to be discussed at the international monetary convention in Holland this fall, although one need not have traveled farther than the boundary line between this country and Canada in order to form some idea of its gravity. It is a subject that has been much discussed heretofore, but without widespread result. The franc of France, the lira of Italy and the peseta of Spain have like values and pass freely in all of those countries, but beyond their boundaries coins having an international value are practically unknown. Thus far the United States, Great Britain and most of the European continental countries have failed, rather than refused, to enter into a coinage union. It is hoped that definite progress in this direction may be made in the coming international monetary convention, but it is realized that the obstacles in the way of attaining an end so desirable are many and not easily to be overcome.

Railway Development in Japan

The remarkable progress made by Japan in recent years is nowhere more strikingly illustrated than in the growth of her railway system. Her first railroad, extending from Yokohama to Shimbashi, and but 18 miles in length, was opened for traffic in 1872. This was but 38 years ago, a time so brief that comparatively young people can remember all of it, yet today Japan has 5,029 miles of railway, not including any that may have been added within the last year. Japan tried the experiment of private ownership, but became dissatisfied, and last year the government owned 4,552 miles of railway, while but 477 miles were in private hands. It is notable that both passenger and freight rates (but particularly the latter) have been reduced since the government came into possession of most of the lines, although net earnings of about five per cent are made in the state's lines, which are capitalized at $377,000,000, and the amount of traffic constantly is increasing.

Some Panama Canal Statistics

Here are some statistics relating to the construction of the Panama canal: It is estimated that it will cost $375,000,000, but this is an estimate which may lack a good deal of hitting the mark. At the present time 38,000 men are working on the canal, and already they have removed more than 105,000,000 cubic yards of earth, while about 60,000,000 cubic yards remain. The bottom of the canal will vary from 300 to 1000 feet in width, and its length will be 50 1/2 miles. It is hoped to finish it in another four or five years, but the time still is problematical.

Wants To See the Wheels Go Round

(Some of the large portrait-posters of Alden Anderson which add an inexplicable charm and grace to this political campaign bear the announcement that he wants to see the wheels go round.)

What though for three decades we've worn
The badge that proves we are not free?
What though whene'er our coat is torn
The "S. P." stamp beneath we see?
What though the state that God made great Is labeled, "Corporation Ground.
Your freight rates juggled while you wait?"—
He wants to see the wheels go round.

Dear Justice sits upon the bench,
Her mantle 'brodered thus: "S. P."
She is a coy yet buxom wench,
And strong on technicality.
The whistle blows, the court convenes;
The court adjourns at whistle's sound—
He stands as one who dreameth dreams,
And wants to see the wheels go round.

Has heard the tale of Santa Cruz,
How bribed and briber both were there,
With felon hands to seize and use
Such coin as Herrin had to spare?
Thence rose a stench as foul as grim,
In which an honest soul might swoon—
It matters not at all to him;
He wants to see the wheels go round.

We're owned and branded. None deny,
But some opine this adds a charm
To lure the transient passer-by,
And add, "It really does no harm."
But men there be, true MEN, who vow
Our state shall be but freemen's ground.
Such stalwart men are needed now—
He wants to see the wheels go round.

Church Papers and the Issue

The people of California are engaged in a tremendous moral conflict, and here are its issues:

Judges have been chosen at the behest, and to do the will of, the one wholesale litigant whose cases are in all the courts of the state. Is this a condition to be endured by honest men who desire nothing but exact justice?

By the cunning manipulation of this same power legislators have been selected to make laws in its behalf rather than in that of the people. Can such a condition be tolerated by honest freemen?

Great political conventions have been corrupted, its delegations have been bought and sold like chattels of the market-place, and the people have paid "all that the traffic will bear" in order that this evil power might flourish. Can self-respecting men endure this condition longer?

The source of all this festering corruption is, and is known to be, the Southern Pacific Company in politics. In the name of manhood, shall it be put out of politics?

These are moral questions, or morality has nothing to do with public good. In them and in the answer to them is involved, in no slight degree, the destiny of our country and our race, or history teaches us nothing. Truest religion eventually must live or die with the answer men give to such questions.

Yet—

There come to our exchange table a number of religious or sectarian papers representing the spirit and sentiment of certain churches, and, I take it, representing them aright or they would not be supported.

And in not one of these papers have I seen one word relating to these mighty moral issues which now shake California to its very foundation. Somebody asked why churches appear to be decadent. Can you not imagine the answer? The organization purporting to uphold the right, which has nothing to do with vital moral issues of living, should not expect to exist. Christ drove the money-changers out of the temple; he didn't devote his time to theorizing concerning Solomon's temple.

Thoughtful Man on the Legislature

"A handkerchief," the Thoughtful Man remarked, "is not a particularly attractive adjunct of one's costume, but there are times when it is very useful, as I suppose you would admit, would you not?"

"What under the sun are you getting at?" said I.

"Of course," the Thoughtful Man continued, "twenty-seven handkerchiefs does seem a large number to be carried all at once, but when the Southern Pacific and its higher-up friends need handkerchiefs they need them bad. On the whole, I don't think that 27 is any too many, and of course there always are one or two who refuse to be handkerchiefs even when the Southern Pacific nose needs attention the most, and—"

"What are you talking about?" I inquired.

"As I was saying when you interrupted me," he continued, "the San Francisco delegations in the state legislature always have been very useful, and I do not know what the Southern Pacific would have done, in seasons of bad colds, if it had not had one or more of them in each one of its pockets. Of course an occasional traitor like Callan refuses to be a handkerchief, insolently insisting that the Southern Pacific should furnish material for blowing its own nose, but such, thank Heaven, have been rare, and the dear people usually have refused to return them after one term, for if there is a thing that San Francisco is passionately fond of it is supplying political handkerchiefs for the Southern Pacific epizootic.

"It is lamentably true that the country is less ready to supply these handkerchiefs than is our splendid metropolis, but with a start of 25, more or less, from the city, the Southern Pacific rarely is caught in bad condition for sneezing. Sir, let the misguided people elect Hiram Johnson if they will; if at the same time they will elect a sufficient number of pocket handker—that is, of honorable legislators, the dear old Machine will not mind; it will attend to its own nose. This is our trust, our hope."

And you bet it is.

Burdette and Hiram Johnson

It is much to be regretted that Rev. R. J. Burdette saw fit to attack Hiram Johnson in such manner as he did. Once upon a time there was a "Bob" Burdette who would not have done this thing. He was a kindly man and a just, this Bob of years gone by, and we loved him much because in his world of humor there was no sting and in his fund of philosophy there was no injustice. Some of us remember how humor and pathos blended in the flow of his ink, and his written advice to his "son" was part of the treasured lore of our childhood; so we are glad that it was not he, but the Rev. R. J. Burdette—and we say it with no intent to reflect upon the clerical profession—who made this unjust attack upon Hiram Johnson.

For it was unjust, and cruelly so. Summed up, it amounts to this: Mr. Johnson's father has not made a good political record; therefore we should expect (and indeed insist, if need be) that the son must be politically bad. The argument limps to its own destruction. Mr. Burdette knows, and so does every man and woman who has attained years of discretion, that thousands of bad fathers have good sons, while other thousands of good fathers have bad sons. The assertion needs no proof, for its truth lies within the knowledge of all men. It is the privilege of Rev. R. J. Burdette to support whom he pleases for governor, but if he had no other argument than this against Hiram Johnson it were better had he kept his mouth closed, for the evident injustice of the words that issued from it was relieved only by their transparent folly.

On the whole, about all the consolation that remains in this matter to the lover of fair play is found in the reflection that the "Bob" Burdette whom we knew and loved didn't do it. He who did it was less kind, less just and decidedly less wise than the old Bob.

Curry and the Ten Commandments

(Charles F. Curry, gubernatorial candidate, has announced his faith in the doctrines promulgated in the United States Constitution, the Declaration of Independence and the Ten Commandments.)

Oh, beauteous faith thus nobly shown!
Oh, stalwart hero, thus alone
To bid defiance to the crew
Who long to break these things in two!
For well he knows, as well he must,
The sov'reign people yearn to bust
That Declaration and the rest,
And yet the spirit in his breast
Impels him to defiance fling;
It does, by heck! It does, by jing!
Oh, when you look for heroes, pray
Don't let our Curry get away.

The Ten Commandments, as all see,
Do not denounce our coy S. P.,
The Declaration, too, is shy—
"Then why," says Curry, "why not I?
My faith in them is fixed so well
I do not mind the engine-bell,
The whistle toot, the load we bear—
The Constitution these doth spare,
And so do I. But you can bet
The Declaration holds me yet.
Avaunt, ye knaves, who yearn to bust
The words immortal that I trust,
Including not our dear S. P.!
Arouse, ye Romans! Vote for me!"
Ah, friends, who heroes seek today,
Please don't let Curry get away.

Chances In His Favor

A learned Senior met,

May be as wise as he."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Look Carefully To The Legislature

The next legislature in California will be Republican on joint ballot. No power can prevent it. Add to the hold-over Republican senators the candidates from safely Republican districts and the result becomes a foregone conclusion. Therefore, voters may go to the polls unhindered and unhaunted by fears of putting the United States senatorship in danger. That is settled so far as party is concerned. But the legislature may be safely Republican and unsafely progressive or free. Therefore no voter should vote for any legislative candidate, believing him to be doubtful as to railroad affiliations, merely in the interests of making the legislature Democratic or Republican. That will be effort thrown away. The question each voter should ask is: Is he fit to legislate? If, with reference to any candidate, this answer must be in the negative, don't vote for him. Write in instead the name of the best man running on any ticket. This will not count in making him the nominee of his party, but only of your own, but its moral influence will not be lost on the November election. Again, look carefully to the legislature. Unless there is some coup in store, of which we know nothing at this time, Johnson's nomination is assured and the "organization" crowd know it so well that they are turning their attention to securing a legislature that will be at cross purposes with Johnson and so prevent anything worth while being done. Now a good Democrat will be more likely to work with Johnson for Right Things than will an "organization" Republican. Wherever there is a free Democrat pitted against a Republican under bondage to Herrin free Republicans should give the Democrat the advantage of a vote on the Republican primary ticket for its moral effect in November. Remember the issue is not so much "Republican or Democrat," as it is "Bond or Free."

C. C. Young Should Be Unanimously Nominated

C. C. Young was elected two years ago from the 52nd assembly district as a militant exponent of the reform Republican movement, and he made good. He proved the earnestness of his purpose by attending every session of the last legislature, and by working from daybreak to midnight of every day he was there. He quickly mastered the intricate details of parliamentary practice, and by reason of his executive ability was soon ranked as a leader of the anti-machine forces.

According to Hichborn's table of test votes in his "Story of the California Legislature of 1909," C. C. Young voted right every time. He voted for the anti-racetrack bill, against the machine report of the committee on rules, for an effective primary law, for the non-partisan judicial ballot, and for the interests of the People as against the interests of the "machine" on every vote. Mr. Young was one of the leaders in the fight for the resolution calling on the United States government to establish a federal line of steamships from San Francisco to Panama, for the purpose of breaking the iniquitous monopoly of the Pacific Mail.

It was Mr. Young, also, who secured the ratification of the Berkeley charter, one of the most hopeful experiments in the interests of more democratic and more efficient municipal government.

The experience gained by Mr. Young in the last session qualifies him for even more successful leadership at the next session of the legislature. Mr. Young's ability and character are proved quantities, and they have measured up to an exceptionally high standard. Mr. Young's course in the last legislature was in accord with the wishes of the vast majority of his constituents. What reason, then, should there be for displacing him? Absolutely none, and The Watchman has faith in the sagacity of the Republicans of the 52nd district to believe that they will see this point clearly.

The Watchman also believes these voters to be acute enough to realize that the task of persuading the right sort of men to run for public office will become increasingly difficult if men who have done their duty ably and faithfully in public life are turned down upon reasons of whim or caprice, or because their opponents are personally agreeable. Not that The Watchman believes for a moment that C. C. Young's candidacy is in the slightest danger, for it is not—the militant young Republicanism of Berkeley will attend to that—but that The Watchman feels that Mr. Young merits the practically unanimous support of Republican voters in his district.

A few facts in Mr. Young's private life may be of interest. Born in New Hampshire in 1869, Mr. Young's parents brought him to California when he was a year old, so that he is, by all his training, a Californian. He entered the state university from Santa Rosa, and graduated in 1892. For a few months Mr. Young was vice-principal of the Santa Rosa High School, leaving that position to take charge of the English department of the Lowell High School, in San Francisco, in which position he continued for thirteen years, until the fire of 1906, though, for the latter part of that time he had been residing in Oakland.

Since the fire Mr. Young has been engaged in the real estate business in Berkeley. During all the years in school work he chafed at the idea that the nature of his position prevented him from enjoying the right of a citizen to take part in the government of his state. So when the opportunity came to do his share in politics, he seized it with energy. He entered the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League in Berkeley, and in that organization and in local affairs took an active part. He is a member of the State Executive Committee of the League. He has also done a great deal of good government work in Berkeley, where he has shown a fine public spirit and a rare insight into affairs of state. His candidacy for re-election is endorsed by the League and by all the precinct leaders. He is too valuable in the cause of good government to be lost to the state.

The esteem in which Mr. Young is held outside his district, and the mark he made in the last legislature is indicated by an incident at Hiram Johnson's last meeting about the bay. At an overflow meeting held at Lincoln Hall, South Berkeley, July 29th, Mr. Johnson, in his address, spoke as follows:

"It has been my practice during this campaign to take no part in local political situations, and yet I feel I should be recreant to my opportunity tonight if I did not give mention to one local candidate for office whom it is my privilege to support at the coming election. I refer to the assemblyman from your district. He is a man whom I know well, and know to be worthy the support of every voter. At the last session of the legislature he stood squarely up against the machine at every point. He made a man's fight where men were needed, and you should send him back to continue that fight."

"With absolutely no disparagement to the candidacies of any other men who may be seeking this nomination, I still say to you that the one thing you should do at the primary election is to send back to Sacramento your present assemblyman, C. C. Young."

How to Fill Blank Spaces

In only a few instances will blank spaces be found on Republican primary tickets throughout the state. Being the dominant party it has not been difficult to nominate a full ticket, although there are two assembly districts in which there will be no Republican opposition to popular Democratic candidacies. In all cases where there are vacancies in the party ticket, or where the candidacy for the party nomination cannot in good conscience be approved, the voter should write on his ballot the name of the candidate for some other party nomination, to the end that such candidate may become the nominee of both parties and so prevent the irrepressible joker making Julius Caesar, Nelson Aldrich or Bwana Tumbo the official nominee of a party. This will not only head off the practical joker but, by making the nominee of one party the nominee of all parties, it will prevent a contest in the election in November and so prove conducive to an era of good fellowship, and non-partisan representation. Democrats should be particularly careful to write the name of A. B. Nye in the proper space for State Controller, inasmuch as their party has no candidate for that office, and inasmuch as there is evidence to show that Frank Mattison is urging his Democratic friends to write in his name so that he may contest in November, as a Democrat, what he can but regard as a forlorn hope before Republicans at the primaries. Each voter should fill every space on his ticket and, that he may do this to best advantage, he should provide himself with a Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League ticket before he goes into his booth from which to fill vacancies on his own ticket.

The "Pork" Issue In The Second District

There is a type of mind that cannot look above the "pork" issue in considering a candidacy for congress. Those who place that issue foremost are passing the word around through the second district that unless Duncan McKinlay is sent to congress appropriations will not be obtained for the Sacramento river, and such other purposes as they would like to see Uncle Sam's money expended for in that district. Now as to which is the fitter of the two men, Kent or McKinlay, for securing "pork" from the national barrel depends on what kind of "pork" is wanted. If the district wants good, honest "pork," such "pork" as it by rights ought to have and would be justly entitled to for purposes bona fide, then William Kent will bring home as much as Duncan McKinlay, but if no questions are to be asked regarding the "pork," whether sound or rotten, deserved or not deserved, well, Mr. Kent is not a man to go to the "pork" barrel, or to ask his friends to help him to get to it, without first knowing that it supplies an honest need. Mr. Kent has friends of influence all over the country upon whom he can call in the name of justice and right whenever he needs their influence for a just and right cause. Never again will allegiance to Cannonism be the sole prerequisite for access to the "pork" barrel. With the passing of that opportunity will pass Duncan McKinlay's strongest "pull" on that barrel.

William C. Clark The opportunity to inject a little of the New England conscience into the legislature in the person of William C. Clark should appeal strongly to the voters of the Fiftieth assembly district, especially in view of the awful "fall-down" of Harry W. Pulcifer at the last session. Mr. Clark comes originally from Maine, particularly from the town of Foxcroft. Coming to California in boyhood, Mr. Clark resided successively at Santa Monica, Haywards and Berkeley. The common school education begun in Maine was completed in California. This education was broadened by travel in his early youth, for his father's business called for many business trips, and young Clark accompanied him on many of these through the New England and Atlantic states.

After completing his public school course, Mr. Clark was eager for the advantages of a college education, but was dependent upon his own resources to get it. He taught for some time, between school and university, in the San Francisco Business College, of which he was a graduate. But the means by which he finally achieved his college course was by the purchase, in partnership with his brother, of a bicycle agency in Berkeley, the profits of which enabled him to attend the university. But the exigencies of money making required interruptions of his courses, so that, after entering the university in 1892 he was compelled to remain out of college from 1893 to 1896, completing his college education by graduation in 1899.

After leaving Berkeley, Mr. Clark studied law at Hastings Law School, San Francisco, and was admitted to the bar in 1900. The next year Mr. Clark started out to see something of Europe, in company with a college mate, H. L. Breed, brother of Arthur H. Breed, the well-known real estate operator of Oakland. Most of this European tour was made on bicycles.

Returning to Oakland, Mr. Clark entered the real estate business in the office of George B. M. Gray, where he continued for four years. In 1906, just after the San Francisco fire, Mr. Clark opened a law office in Oakland, and has since continued in the practice of the law.

Mr. Clark has always been distinguished for two characteristics: for thoroughness in the execution of any task set before him, and for the strong and loyal attachment he arouses in his friends. These qualities, together with an earned reputation for sincerity and candor, have made him a man of the thoroughly dependable type.

Mr. Clark attracted wide and favorable notice, soon after he settled in Oakland, by his efficient work as secretary, for two years, and later as president, for an equal period, of the Men's League of the First Congregational Church. It was largely due to Mr. Clark's earnest purpose and organizing ability that the membership of the League was built up from a comparatively small number to its present large enrollment and its present condition as one of the most active and effective centers of municipal uplift in any city on the Pacific Coast. Mr. Clark developed the forum department of the league, and brought to it some of the most interesting and forceful speakers of the day, making the league an educational power in Oakland.

Mr. Clark was a member of the Municipal League until the death of that organization, and was a delegate to its conventions. Two years ago he was actively in politics in behalf of Senator Stetson and the cause of the direct primary law. In this campaign he was precinct captain, and a member of the steering committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League delegation to the county convention. He was one of the authors of the resolution, which he introduced on the floor of the convention, by which Harry W. Pulcifer was pledged to the support of the anti-racetrack gambling law.

This year, Mr. Clark has been one of the active leaders in the charter convention for a revision of Oakland's charter. He was nominated by the convention for one of the fifteen freeholders to revise the charter. His candidacy was endorsed by the Progressives, and he was subsequently nominated by both the Republicans and Democrats. He was elected a freeholder by the highest vote of any on the Progressive ticket.

Harry W. Pulcifer, the incumbent assemblyman, against whom Mr. Clark is a candidate for the Republican nomination, professed Lincoln-Roosevelt principles at the last election, but voted consistently with the machine on every critical vote. He notably deserted the cause of reform in his vote on the bill providing for an advisory vote on United States senator, when he changed his vote from aye to no when he saw that the machine needed it. Pulcifer ranks 52nd of the 80 assemblymen in Hichborn's record of test votes.

William C. Clark should be the Republican nominee. It was considered necessary two years ago to pledge Pulcifer to do the right thing at the legislature, and then he fell down. Nobody considers it necessary to pledge Mr. Clark. He is known to be a stable quantity, that can be relied on to do the right thing without pledges. That is the sort of assemblymen that is needed.

MR. ALFRED L. MORGENSTERN

Alfred L. Morgenstern The 47th assembly district comprises the major part of the city of Alameda. In the last session of the legislature that district was represented by Frank Otis, a man of good intentions who generally voted right, but whose political courage is not equal to the test of coming out and standing with the reform element aggressively. This year Otis is seeking higher honors in the senate, and the field is open to two candidates, Alfred L. Morgenstern and Sumner Crosby. The candidacy of the latter is objectionable for several reasons. One is that Joe Lanktree, the machine boss of Alameda, was one of the sponsors of his candidacy when it was announced and is still one of Crosby's most ardent supporters. That should be reason enough for putting voters on their guard. When approached by a committee from the Alameda Good Government Republican Club, Mr. Crosby disclaimed the possession of sufficient information upon such subjects as direct vote for United States senator, conservation and similar issues, to enable him to have an opinion on them, and announced that he felt qualified to form correct judgments on these subjects after his election.

On the other hand, Alfred L. Morgenstern has followed the public discussion of these subjects for years, and had reached definite conclusions upon them before he was urged to make the race for the assembly. It was because his views already coincided with the views of Progressive Republicanism in this state that he was sought out and finally prevailed upon to run. His candidacy is a genuine case of the office searching out the man, as he had never taken active part in politics and had no desire for public office. The Good Government Club settled upon him as the man to make their kind of race.

Mr. Morgenstern was born in San Francisco, Jan. 23, 1873. He was educated in the public schools of San Francisco and Alameda, but was compelled by circumstances to leave at the age of fifteen and make his own living. He worked for a time in the lumber business, and was afterwards for many years connected with the Sperry Flour Company as cashier of the Capitol Mills. But, though he had to leave school, his interest in learning never wavered, and he constantly seized opportunities for the improvement of his mind. About ten years ago he spent a year traveling in Europe, not only for the sake of sightseeing, but also to study the political economy of the various European countries. He was surprised to find in some of these countries progress in essential democracy in some respects far ahead of America. More recently, Mr.

Morgenstern has traveled in the Orient for six months, where he was impressed with the beauties of some parts of the eastern philosophy, and with the success with which Japan has taken on the civilization of the west without sacrifice of the strength and order of the older civilization.

This thoughtful and studious habit of mind distinguishes Mr. Morgenstern. Years ago he was clerk of a police court in San Francisco, until he left the post in disgust at the sordid relation to political pull sustained by the police cases. This experience first opened his eyes to the corrupt relation between business, the tenderloin and politics, and started him upon the train of thought that long since determined him to devote his life to the square deal in business and in politics. He studied the problems of government, and grew convinced of the democratic necessity for the direct election of United States senators, of the utility of the initiative, referendum and recall, of the need for a parcels post and for the conservation of natural resources. He is pledged to abide by the will of the people of his district with regard to United States senator. His police court experience brought him to the belief in the necessity for removing judicial offices from partisan politics, and for increasing the tenure and remuneration of judges to attract better men to the bench.

Mr. Morgenstern was never heretofore active in politics, because he did not want to be subservient to any boss, but with the passage of the direct primary law he has been made to see that the rules of the game admit him to play it as he would be willing to play it. He went into the fight against his will, but is making an earnest campaign now that he has taken the plunge, and is paying all his campaign expenses out of his own pocket. His candidacy is endorsed by the Alameda Good Government Club, the Bay Shore Republican Club and the Phi Delta Sigma fraternity of Alameda. Mr. Morgenstern is a past president of Halcyon (Alameda) Parlor, N. S. G. W.

If the voters of the 47th district want a forthright, progressive, earnest and dependable representative, Alfred L. Morgenstern is the man they should nominate.

John Ralph Wilson In The 20th Senatorial John Ralph Wilson is the progressive Republican candidate for the 14th district. His opponents are George J. Hans and Frank Otis. The 20th district was represented in the last legislature by J. Clem Bates, who achieved a record that put him twenty-eighth from the top of Hiehorn's list, with ten votes against reform and four votes for it. That record entitled Mr. Bates to disappear from public life, which he has done without public regret.

This was made the occasion for Frank Otis to put the wings to his ambition to rise out of the assembly. Otis represented the 47th assembly district in the session of 1909, where his record put him twenty-eighth out of the eighty assemblymen, with nine votes for reform to his credit and only two against. This record was good enough to entitle Mr. Otis to the endorsement of the Alameda Progressive Republicans, other things being equal.

But on some other—and vital—things, Mr. Otis did not measure up to the demands of the hour. This is the year of greatest insurgency against machine control of political and legislative affairs in the history of California, and only those men who are willing to stand out and be counted, either as sheep or goats, deserve the support of the reform element. Here is where Mr. Otis showed his weakness. He declined to state his platform of beliefs upon the vital issues of the campaign, to pledge himself upon them, or to declare whether or not he would join in the movement, to be made at the next session of the legislature, to so organize the senate and assembly that the reform forces can exercise the control to which their majority last time entitled them, but which their lack of organization made ineffective.

Mr. Otis, when questioned by representatives of the Good Government Club of Alameda, declined to express himself in favor of specific reform measures or in favor of reform organization of the senate. The club gave him every opportunity to secure their endorsement, and he failed to avail himself of the chance.

The club then went on a search for a candidate whose record and expressed beliefs put him squarely on the platform advocated by the leaders of the reform movement. Mr. Hans was not such a candidate, and Mr. Hans has consistently sought and is receiving the support of the reactionary and discredited "machine."

The club finally found their candidate in John Ralph Wilson, who, long before his endorsement by the club, had publicly and in writing made the following statement:

"Of specific measures now occupying the public mind, I favor and will actively support the following:

"1. Amending the present complex Direct Primary Law in order to simplify and facilitate its operation.

"2. Elimination of the Judiciary from Partisan Politics.

"3. Election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people.

"4. Such amendments to the Penal Code and to the Code of Civil Procedure as shall insure speedy trial and prompt decision of all cases strictly upon their merits and without regard to technicalities.

"5. The Initiative, Referendum and Recall.

"6. The re-establishment of the Australian Ballot System in its original simplicity."

This statement was preceded by an avowal of the following crucial issue of the day:

"It is my conviction that the citizens of California demand the crushing out of the Southern Pacific Political Machine, which has for years dominated all political parties in this state, and to this end I shall, if elected, align myself on the side of those legislators who work and vote against 'Special Privilege' and for the interests of all the people. I therefore favor such revision of the rules governing the legislature as shall eradicate 'Canonism' from that body and shall place the state government in the hands of the real rather than an artificial majority."

These forthright statements on the right side of critical issues entitle Mr. Wilson to the support of all progressive Republicans in his district. Personally, Mr. Wilson is a clean-cut young man, a lawyer whose practice in San Francisco for the last eleven years has grown steadily in volume and importance. His services in the Republican municipal convention of 1907 and later, in the campaign, in behalf of the Taylor-Langdon ticket, earned him the admiration of all good citizens. He should be sent to the senate this year.

In the Case Of The Fifty-first The contest for the Republican nomination in the fifty-first assembly district presents some difficulties. Of R. H. Hefferman, The Watchman knows little except that he is a teamster, somewhat advanced in years and in bibulous tendencies. It is not known that the laboring or other interests have had anything to do with bringing out him out. His candidacy may be looked upon as negligible.

Of Frank M. Smith this much is known: He is a reputable business man, well regarded by his neighbors, too self respecting to do anything questionable, is what would be called a practical politician, will take program from those who support him, has something of an aptitude for politics, but has given no great amount of attention to public affairs. He is such a man as would attract the attention of a political manager as a good one to cultivate and make something of in his community, and report has it that Mayor Mott of Oakland has had his eye on Smith for some time as having good political timber in him, preferable for a friend than for an enemy. Smith has had his eye on the assembly for the better part of a year and will get there if he can. If the fifty-first district should send Smith it will at least be decently represented.

But James H. Pond, recently, and for seven years, principal of the Oakland High School, and, for more years than that, principal of the high school at Sacramento, a high type man from every point regarded, is also candidate for the Republican nomination. He is unfortunate in being supported by the Tribune of Oakland, and by the Joe Cook contingent, but these influences are supporting him, not because they like Pond more, or expect to exert any influence over him if nominated and elected, but because they want to beat the Good Government Organization candidate if they can. Dr. Pond (he is about to be certificated to practice medicine) is in every sense a high class man, perfectly innocent of politics as played under the rules of the game, but a man who has a good knowledge of public affairs, high ideals and, if nominated and elected, may be counted on to stand straight up, to stand for the right as God gives him grace to see the right. He will take advice from men of known high character, but he will take program from no one.

DR. T. B. HOLMES

Dr. T. B. Holmes For Coroner

The coroner's office in Alameda county, under the regime of Doctor Tisdale, has been for years a hotbed of political manipulation. Whether the stories that have been common talk during this period are true or not, they have been persistently told and are of the most disagreeable nature, reflecting upon the delicacy with which the relatives of the dead have been treated and suggesting improprieties of the gravest nature in the business administration of the office. Of Doctor Tisdale personally it can be baldly stated that he is absolutely unfit for public office. And of Doctor Tisdale, the official, it is unnecessary to know whether the scandalous rumors concerning the coroner's office during his incumbency are true or not; the fact that they are continuously repeated and generally believed is enough to make it highly desirable that the office be put in hands above all suspicion.

Alameda county, at the approaching primary, has the opportunity to make this desirable change and to choose a successor of unimpeachable character in the person of Dr. T. B. Holmes. Doctor Holmes is one of the best known physicians of Oakland. He is, and has long been, identified with the good government element in the Republican party. Two years ago he was the president of the East Oakland organization of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. At the same time he was vice-president and acting chairman of the Alameda County Lincoln-Roosevelt League. Ever since he became a voter, Doctor Holmes has been affiliated with the Republican party. But until the present campaign, though he has always taken an active interest in politics, it has always been on behalf of other men whose candidacy he furthered because he believed they represented good government ideals. His interest in the present coroner's fight was solely to find a good man to defeat the incumbent. When the demand came that he make the fight himself, Doctor Holmes resented the idea of making a campaign in his own behalf, and it was only after he was made to see that this attitude put him in the position of urging others to undertake a duty from which he himself shrunk that he would consider it at all. But now that he is in the race, Doctor Holmes is making an active canvass, in which he is entitled to receive the support of all those who believe in decency in government.

Doctor Holmes was born in Nova Scotia, April 12, 1866. In that day, Nova Scotians were "born with an ax in their hands," and so, at twenty years of age, when Doctor Holmes came to California, he turned to the lumbering camps for work. He spent two and a half years in the woods near Lake Tahoe. Later, coming down to Oakland, he learned the plasterer's trade, at which he worked for several years to put himself through college. The last work that he did in this trade was on an insurance building in San Francisco during a college vacation.

Graduating from the Medical College of the University of California in 1894, Doctor Holmes began practice in Reno, Nevada, where he remained for more than three years. Soon after his arrival he was appointed county physician of Washoe county, and gave such satisfaction that the board of supervisors turned over to him the matter of admitting patients to the county hospital and the county farm, and commended him for the most economical administration of his office in the county's history.

After leaving Nevada, Doctor Holmes settled in East Oakland, where he has ever since resided and practiced. In May, 1895, he was married to Miss Lelia J. Backus, of Oakland. Four children are the result of this marriage, three boys and a girl.

Doctor Holmes has announced that his idea of the proper administration of the coroner's office, to which he pledges himself, calls for more efficient and more economical management, and for the utmost consideration of the people with whom the office deals.

Doctor Holmes has the respect and confidence of all who know him. Something of the clean freshness of the woods is suggested in his manner; and the clear eye and frank address betoken the honest man. He is a wholesome sort of person, high-minded, independent and in earnest. The Watchman heartily commends him to the Republican voters of Alameda county.

Fred F. Morse A Link In Chain of State Reform

There is a situation in the county government of Alameda county that has a vital connection with the "machine" control of the state. This situation is the one whereby the majority of the board of supervisors—Kelly, Bridges and Horner—who habitually outvote Foss and Mullins, are lined up with the machine in the county at every political crisis and at all other times. The payment of machine political debts by the machine majority of the board has resulted in extravagance in administration and in an increase in the tax rate. And the retaining of machine political henchmen by the machine majority of the board has had a large effect upon elections, always to the detriment of reform.

This connection between the state and county fight in Alameda county should not be forgotten by the voters at the approaching primary, because they have then an opportunity to break the machine ring in the board of supervisors. One of the incumbent machine men, Bridges, is up for re-election, and he is opposed by a candidate, Fred F. Morse, who is pledged to the right side of things in the state fight and pledged, in the local fight, to join forces with Foss and Mullins to throw the power of the board of supervisors from the extravagant and ward-political side of public questions to the economical and general-public-welfare side.

Fred F. Morse was born in Cresco, Iowa, April 18, 1868. He was educated in Iowa and Minnesota, and graduated from the state university of the latter state in 1892. From Minnesota he removed to Jennings, Louisiana, where he engaged in business and where he served as a councilman and school director. Coming to California five years ago, primarily to avail himself, on behalf of his children, of the superior school advantages of this state, Mr. Morse settled in Oakland, where he has since been interested in real estate and in the mining business. Here again he has served as a school director. This, and city councilman, are the only public offices he has ever sought or held.

Mr. Morse has had a stake in the community ever since he has been in Alameda county, and has taken a lively interest in the problems of his county and state. In consenting to allow his name to be used as a candidate against Bridges, he was moved to the action by a willingness to put at the service of the community a long business training and experience in a position where such a qualification is greatly needed, and by a realization that, aside from the business qualification, he would bring to the board of supervisors a sense of duty to the public welfare that is also needed.

His platform, then, consists of two planks: The application to county problems of the same business caution, sagacity and integrity that a man brings to his own business affairs; and the active participation in the movement to take the board of supervisors out of the ring of machine politicians and restore it to its position as the upright and dignified legislative body of the county.

Leavitt's Bad Record

Senator Frank Leavitt is a dangerous man to have in the legislature; how dangerous, his record is the best evidence. By that test let him be condemned: In the session of 1907 he voted against a bill to give the people an advisory vote in the election of United States senators; against the Stetson direct primary bill; against the demurrage bill; against Boynton's bill for the proper sale of prison-made jute bags; against abolishing special findings in damage cases, whereby poor litigants are exhausted while vainly seeking justice; against the initiative and referendum amendment to the constitution; against the anti-prize fight bill. All these were good measures and he should have voted for them. He voted for the infamous change of venue bill, for the "four tracks" bill, both bad measures.

In the session of 1909 he voted to exclude Senator Bell, a Republican, from the Republican caucus because he dared to run independently and to beat a "machine" Republican; for amendments to the direct primary law that would have defeated its purpose; for concurrence with the assembly machine-made amendments to the direct primary bill; for the Wright railroad regulation bill in place of the much better Stetson bill; again he voted and worked for the infamous change of venue bill. All these were bad measures and he should have voted against them. He voted and led the fight against the anti-racetrack gambling bill; against a bill to forbid the sale of liquors within a mile and a half of a university; against the initiative, against the local option bill, against a resolution providing a commission to investigate increases in freight rates. These were all good measures and he should have voted for them. His record condemns him. Let it speak. His conceded ability makes him the more dangerous.

PERSONALIA

Marie Tempest is to be seen this winter in a drama of low life in Paris. It is called "A Thief in the Night" and is an adaptation from "Le Costand des Epinettes."

The theatrical people are wondering if George Ade is planning to entertain the Sultan of Sulu when he arrives in this country. They helped make each other famous.

Liebler and company have secured a new musical comedy by C. M. S. McLellan and Ivan Caryll called "Marriage a la Carte," and are going to produce it early in the fall.

The Swedes who live in Seattle have formed a John Ericsson memorial association to erect a memorial in that city to the inventor of the Monitor. It is hoped that $30,000 can be raised for the monument, and the big Swedish population in the northwestern city says that it is going to be raised, and raised quickly.

Another Terry has taken her place on the stage and seems to have met with promising success at London. She is Neilson Terry, the daughter of Julia Neilson and Fred Terry, and only 17. She had the leading role in "Priscilla Runs Away," a comedy by Countess von Arnim.

THE SORRY RECORD OF PULCIFER

By Franklin Hichborn

(Author Story of California Legislature, 1909)

Harry W. Pulcifer is seeking re-nomination for the assembly in Alameda county, but his record in the last legislature leads the intelligent voters to view his aspirations with disgust. Here are six of his votes when he ignored the rights of the people in order to obey the behests of "the machine."

1. The bill for a direct primary law providing that nominations should be made by the people rather than by boss-ruled conventions had passed the senate by the decisive vote of 27 to 13. The machine saw that this law would place the selection of United States senators beyond its reach and rallied to defeat the bill in the assembly. Amendments were introduced destroying the efficacy of the bill in the selection of United States senators by the people. When the roll was called Pulcifer voted with the better element, but when the last name on the list, Young of Berkeley, was reached, it was seen that the vote stood 37 to 37, and the machine was beaten. Then before the result was announced Pulcifer sprang to his feet and changed his vote. He flopped when he saw that his vote was needed to save the day for the machine. He voted to rob the voters of California of their rights. (See page 1382, Assembly Journal 1909.)

2. When the "Gag Rules" were introduced, the better element pointed out that these rules would leave the assembly at the mercy of a minority. Their adoption would have been a most effective weapon to defeat such a bill as the Walker-Otis anti-race track gambling bill. The gag rules were finally rejected by a vote of 43 to 32—Pulcifer voted for the gag rules. (See page 61, Assembly Journal.)

3. The chief railroad issue before the assembly was in Senate Joint Resolution No. 3, urging congress to adopt measures to free the Pacific Coast from the grasp of the railroad monopoly in preventing all competition by way of the Isthmus of Panama. The resolution passed the senate without a dissenting vote. In the assembly the bill went to the Committee on Federal Relations, but Drew of Fresno moved that the rules be suspended and the resolution acted on immediately. The machine element obeying the railroad and fighting for delay opposed this motion. Pulcifer again voted with the machine to defeat the will of the people. (See page 326 Assembly Journal.)

4. When the above resolution finally came before the assembly, Grove Johnson of Sacramento introduced amendments robbing the bill of half its value. The machine again sought to block the will of the people and Pulcifer voted with the machine for Grove Johnson's amendments. (See page 772 Assembly Journal.)

5. A measure to do away with the "party circle" on the ballot was introduced to restore the Australian ballot to its original effectiveness. The reform element supported the bill, the machine opposed it to a man. The motion to deny this bill a second reading was carried in the assembly by a single vote. Pulcifer furnished that vote, again obeying the word of the machine. (See page 1774 Assembly Journal.)

6. The Judicial Column bill, endorsed by Judges Beatty, Morrow, Gilbert and sixty other eminent California judges, lacked six votes to pass. Pulcifer shrewdly voted for this bill, but when the attendance of the absent members was demanded under "the call of the assembly" (when the doors are locked and the absentees brought in by the sergeant-at-arms) Pulcifer voted with the machine to defeat "the call of the assembly." The presence of the absent members would have secured the six additional votes needed to pass the bill and Pulcifer was therefore responsible for the defeat of this measure.

Pulcifer tries to make much of the fact that he did vote for the Anti-Race Track bill. His action is explained however by this resolution adopted by the convention which nominated him: "Resolved, that this convention of the Republican party in and for the Fiftieth Assembly District hereby pledges its nominee to vote in favor of the enactment of laws to prohibit race track gambling, bookmaking and poolselling." Pulcifer voted right that time because he was both hitched and watched. The very convention which nominated him knew that he would not stand without hitching. Was his vote for the "Gag Rules" an attempt to pull off the halter?

Poor Pulcifer! His actual record damns him. His professions sound well but his recorded votes show that he is not a man to be trusted.

SUMMER SCHOOL, AN EDUCATIONAL DEMOCRACY

MAKING THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA THE UNIVERSITY OF ALL THE PEOPLE

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

A touch of pathos humanizes the sessions of the University of California Summer School, as one sees the gray heads mingling with the brown at the lectures. They mean that here have come those to whom the opportunity for learning was denied in youth, or those who have learned the value of knowledge in the sober school of experience, come now gladly to grasp the golden chance for study and instruction.

Ten years ago, eager students asked if Dean O'Neil, of the chemistry department, could not leave the doors of the laboratories open during vacation. Their request was granted, and a handful of students remained, rejoicing in the opportunity for added hours of work.

Growth in Ten Years

This year, only ten years later, the summer session has lasted six weeks. Instead of the handful of students in attendance, there were this year 1050. Instead of the laboratory course, there were this year 125 courses, covering well-nigh the whole range of college instruction. Instead of one or two instructors, there were this year seventy instructors and assistants. Instead of drawing these instructors from one department of the university, they were drawn from all America and from Europe. Instead of attracting a few local school teachers and extra-enthusiastic undergraduates, they attracted students from every walk of life and from twenty-eight of the states and territories.

The courses shall be described below, but more interesting are the people who came to hear them, hungry for knowledge. Representatives from thirty-five occupations besides school teachers attended the lectures. There were representatives from each of these vocations—not merely one, but many from each: lawyers, doctors, brokers, letter-carriers, bootblacks, barbers, miners, stenographers, nurses and other professions, trades and industries. There were girls with braids down their backs, gray-haired women old enough to be grandmothers, boys in their teens and men nearing the three-score and ten. When the dean of the summer school told one of the professors that eighteen vocations were represented in his class, including bootblacks and bankers, he was astonished.

"I would never have guessed it," he said. "All I saw was the most earnest group of students I have ever had."

Here, then, is the genuine democratization of education. The undergraduate is too often a callow youth groping rather blindly and with little earnestness for the fruits of knowledge, not sure of their value and ignorant of the use to which he shall put them. But the summer school student comes with an eager thirst for knowledge, a definite understanding of what he wants to know and why he needs to know it, and often at the sacrifice of comfort and convenience to get it. No shallow classification of sophomore and senior disturbs this eagerness to learn. No hollow distinction of caste divides student from student. They are all there to learn, the time is brief and they must be in earnest to get what they want.

When the summer school was not ten years old, Dean Charles Henry Rieber received a call from a gray-haired man who wished to enter. Pointing to the question, "What is your age?" he asked: "Do I have to fill that out in figures?" He was afraid his age might be a bar to his entrance. Dean Rieber took the paper from his hand and read the reply the applicant had already written. It read: "Not a bit too old to learn." The dean telephoned to the registrar's office and instructed him that the question as to age should be thenceforth stricken from the list.

There are no entrance examinations. The idea is that the benefits of the summer school are for all who want to learn, without regard to the possession, or the lack, of preparation.

Most of the courses are intelligible to anyone of common education and powers of understanding.

Perhaps the most popular course given this summer was on playground work, under the direction of Dr. Everett C. Beach and Mrs. Marian R. Morgan, of Los Angeles. This work was described in a recent issue of The California Weekly.

After the playground course, probably more students were interested in the courses in music, than in any other. Mrs. Lauretta V. Sweesy, of San Jose, was the special lecturer in charge of these classes. Mrs. Sweesy has a real genius for making music intelligible and interesting, and her demonstration class of twenty-five pupils from the public schools of Berkeley was a constant source of inspiration and delight to the teachers who learned from her the art of teaching children music. Here is a case of sacrifice on the part of a teacher, inspired by the interest aroused by the summer school, for Mrs. Sweesy, out of her own resources, is to spend this winter in New York adding to her musical equipment so that she can come to the session next summer with an added power to interest and instruct.

The general students, men and women from the many vocations named in an earlier paragraph, found probably their greatest interest centered in the lectures on English literature and the drama, delivered by Richard Burton, professor of English Literature in the University of Minnesota. These lectures were thoroughly scholarly, but they were so couched in popular form and language that they threw into brilliant perspective the development of the modern English novel from the earliest examples by Richardson and Fielding down to such moderns as Stevenson and Kipling. In these lectures Professor Burton showed how the spirit of each age and the experience of each writer combined to shape the fiction of each period. The correlation of historical and biographical facts and the placing of the events in the development of the novel in their connected order gave the students a comprehensive idea of a great branch of literature as a living whole.

Another course of wide popularity was two series of lectures by Dr. Jesse B. Carter, director of the American School for Classical Studies in Rome. One of these series was on the Topography and Monuments of Ancient Rome, dealing particularly with the founding and growth of the city and with recent archaeological progress in unearthing the ruins. The other series was on Roman Religion, the nature and expression of Roman religious beliefs.

Range of the Courses

But every course found interested students. It is worth while to reproduce the list to show the variety of subjects for which the Summer School authorities found enough students to make it desirable to offer them. Only the general classifications of studies need be shown to illustrate this variety. They were: education, law, history, political science, economics, household administration, anthropology, music, Greek, Latin, English, German, French, Spanish, mathematics, general science, astronomy, physics, geography, chemistry, botany, zoology, physiology, hygiene, paleontology, surveying, drawing, manual training, entomology, nature-study, agricultural education, physical culture and playground work.

Each of these classifications contained from three to nine subheads, or individual courses. For example, the English work included these nine courses: 1. The English Novel; 2. The Modern Drama; 3. Shakespeare; 4. Argumentation and Public Address; 5. Narrative Prose; 6. Great Epics; 7a. and b. The History of English Literature (2 courses); 8. The Epic.

Some of the most distinguished American scholars in these several branches of learning were retained to give these courses. Besides those named above, Miss Sophonisba Preston Breckenridge, assistant professor of household administration in the University of Wisconsin; Miss Lucile Eaves, associate professor of practical sociology in the University of Nebraska; Vernon Lyman Kellogg, professor of Entomology in Leland Stanford Junior University; Miss Margaret E. Schallenberger, principal of the training school of the San Jose Normal School, were among the most prominent visiting educators whose eminence in their special lines of study gave the high standard of scholarship to the Summer School.

The whole faculty, both visiting and resident, was profoundly interested in the work. They all alike noted the exceptional earnestness of the students, and received from it an impetus to enthusiasm. The women especially developed a fine spirit of teamwork in making the summer session a success. They seemed peculiarly adapted to the task of getting coherent results from the very heterogeneous material in the classes.

The summer school movement has taken deep hold of the universities all over America, but probably nowhere with greater success than in Berkeley. The university has not been able to offer the inducements to visiting instructors that are offered by the eastern universities, but it had been singularly fortunate, none the less, in obtaining the best from the whole world. Part of this success is explained by the interest of eastern and European scholars in the scenery and climate of California, and part is explained by the hospitality with which they are received here and by the intense public interest in their courses of lectures. The session just ended was an unqualified success. And it offers a complete refutation to the arguments of those who declare that the great mechanism of university equipment should stop its motion and lie idle from May to August and that the potential power for the distribution of the benefits of knowledge should not be available beyond the average age of the graduate—24 or 25 years. It has proved that education for the masses is a great need, eagerly desired and appreciated, and that there is no age limit on those who will sacrifice time and money to get it when they have the opportunity.

Financial Results of Summer School

A few facts about the financial support of the Summer School: The sole source of income was the $15 fee required of each student. This fee not only paid for tuition regardless of the number of courses taken, but also entitled the student to the full privileges of the university library and, in case of illness, to medical advice and hospital care without extra charge. Small additional fees were charged in laboratory courses to cover wear and tear upon apparatus.

Now this $15 per student was paid in exchange for something over $17 per student that the university had to expend to cover the cost of the Summer School. But here some comparisons are in order:

The attendance in the Summer School was about one-third the regular undergraduate attendance. The length of time the Summer School was open was six weeks, or one-sixth of the regular college term. In other words, the Summer School required one-eighteenth of the attention from the university that a regular undergraduate term receives. But the Summer School received for its maintenance, proportionately, less than one-third hundred and sixtieth part of the money required for an undergraduate term.

Another comparison: One of the students of the Summer School was a teacher who teaches eight months in the year in a backwoods district for $65 a month. The university made her a free gift of something like $2.50 worth of instruction over the $15 she paid. But she came to the dean at the close of the session with tears of gratitude in her eyes to tell of her appreciation of the university's opportunity that she had been permitted to avail herself of. It meant more than money to this girl: it meant an opportunity for cultivation otherwise wholly inaccessible. Now this girl's salary as a school teacher is largely spent in paying the living expenses of a younger brother who attends the regular sessions of the university. The university incurs a deficit of $43 a term on this boy, and gives him six times as much training as his sister received. And probably it never occurs to him to do otherwise than take it as a matter of course that he should receive what he gets.

Here is where the Summer School earns its right to exist. The argument is made that the boy will repay the state in the form of increased efficiency in his life work in the state. That is true enough, but the older student of the Summer School repays the state in gratitude as well as in increased efficiency. And the student of the Summer School repays the state in this additional way: the problems of civilization are sociological problems, and the evils of civilization are mainly due to the ignorance of the average person of his proper relation to the public as a whole. The student of the Summer School is brought into the broad current of contemporaneous life, learns of its tendencies and ideals, and goes away a better citizen for this knowledge, and to be a centre of culture for the further diffusion of it. It would be hard to overestimate the force of the indirect influence for better things that radiates from the people who have interest enough in wisdom to seek it in mature years at this free fountain of knowledge. They have the zeal of proselytes.

These facts suggest the propriety of further state aid to the Summer School work. The advance of the last ten years in attendance and interest testifies conclusively to the public demand for it and to the economic utility of it

It it were sufficiently endowed it could fulfill all the ideals of university extension work, and really make of the state institution a university for the people—all the people.

And it should not be supposed that no undergraduates or advanced students derive any benefit from it. This is not the case. Most of the courses are counted for graduation credits or credits toward a degree, and many undergraduates avail themselves of this fact to do work for which they have not time in the regular session. And advanced students have found that the quieter conditions of vacation time were ideal for doing advanced research laboratory work for their degrees.

A humorous sidelight on the kind of people who sought out the summer courses is given by an experience of Dean Rieber's. After the session closed he happened into a barber shop where he was not known. The barbers were discussing the summer school, and bitterly denounced it as a waste of public money that ought to be suppressed. Later in the day, Dean Rieber was in a dry-goods store and the proprietor congratulated him upon the success of the session, remarking that he had sold more shirtwaists than he had ever done in the same length of time before.

In other words, the men who came to the summer school were not the peg-topped variety that hang around barber shops. And there were many women students of the Summer School.

The first inference is correct. The second is not wholly so, for the men and women were about equal in numbers.

And it was a genuine democracy of education, where rich and poor, old and young, drew round a spring of learning whose waters they knew how to prize and drank freely and joyfully.

JED, in those earlier years of his childhood, was much alone, and yet seldom lonesome.

When the weather was foul there was the great pictorial geography, half as big as an unabridged dictionary, that he could pore over and ask questions about, and when the weather was so that he could be out of doors, which was most of the time, there was a wide, wide world to interest him. He had explored every nook and cranny in the near-by woods, had been to the summits of Mount Hobart, Mount Tabor and Mount Maria, and nothing, Jed felt, could be farther away than those places without being in the big geography.

It was pitiful how, a quarter of a century after, those distances had shriveled. The long reaches had diminished to little better than stone-throws, the "mounts" were not so high as a boy might fly his kite, even the wonderful waterfall, the roar of which, when the creek was up, could be plainly heard as far away as forty rods, and which Jed felt must almost, if not quite, equal Niagara, was easily made insignificant a score of times in the course of any mountain streamlet. Is it because these childhood conceptions do so shrivel that we so willingly put them away from us when we are grown, ashamed of them? Shame upon us rather, that in after years we lose our childhood's power to idealize, to set fancy free that it may build and paint, people earth and sky with visible forms and so make the ideal real.

For Jed's firmest friends were the skies. In the cumulus clouds he saw re-enacted all the tragedies that had touched his life. He saw posses in hot pursuit of horse thieves, Indians riding after fleeing hunters; saw the flash of their pistols and heard the reverberations of their fusillades; saw the animals troop, two by two, into the ark, the doors close, the rains descend and the ark float away triumphantly over the horizon; saw Abraham, Isaac and Jacob come out of the East with their caravans; saw Joseph go down into Egypt and his hungry brethren follow after; saw the fat cows and the lean come up out of the water, the descent of the locusts, the marching away of the Israelites for the promised land with the Egyptians hard upon their track; saw, indeed, all the Bible scenes of which father and mother told him enacted far above the tree tops, all the pictures in the pictorial geography take form, life-size; saw pictures that never were in any book, saw tragedies enacted that were never told in song or story; saw the Inferno rise menacingly out of the northwest, and felt in his face the dank breath of the tomb; saw in the East the bow of promise and ran his little legs nearly off, at the instance of his older cousin, to find the spot out on the rim of the prairie where the rainbow touched the ground, that he might appropriate the pot-full of gold certain to be left there if the spot could be found, but returned empty handed, except for a hat-full of eggs of the prairie-hen, whose nest he found in the wet grass.

The childhood of a child is the childhood of a race, and the romanticists and artists, the idealists and poets, who have interpreted the race to the race have been those who were wise enough not wholly to have put away childish things when they became men. It would seem that the mere statement of Paul that when he became a man he had put away childish things had been accepted as an admonition to put them away, and away away at that, something that Paul probably never had in mind.

The only real comradeship Jed remembered ever to have had with his, in many ways, gifted, and always kindly and hard-pushed father, was during the seventh and eighth years of Jed's life. Besides being a surveyor, which he had become by working the problems out in the chimney corner on stormy days, and in the dimly candle-lighted evenings, Jed's father was the only capable mechanic in the neighborhood, and so he "changed works," if nothing else, and let others cultivate his few acres, for which he had little liking or aptitude, while he repaired their wagons, built their sorghum mills, made their coffins and fixed whatever needed fixing from shoe mending to gunsmithing, never getting anything done as soon as he thought he was going to, but doing everything rather better than it could be done in the little town ten miles away, and as frequently for accommodation as for pay.

If Jed's father was ever unhappy it was when he was thinking of the affairs of his country. If ever he was consciously happy it was when he had edged tools in his hands or was working out a problem in geometry or trigonometry, surveying or calculus. In after years he was unable to understand why Jed preferred checkers to algebra, cards to conic sections, but in those two splendid years, beginning with Jed's having assigned to him seven rows across the garden for his popcorn, which he must tend while father and mother tended the rest, and ending when the family removed to town and Jed's father became the publisher of a country paper, he was content. Those were the years during which father and son understood each other, and the only such years until long after the father had gone to his rest in that wind-swept city overlooking the valleys of the Sandy and the Indigo, rimmed by the terraced hills that swept away into the distance where they stood uplifting upon their shoulders the blue vault of heaven. Then Jed better understood that father and the part he played in making a state free.

If father built over a big wagon, Jed made a little one; if father made a yoke for oxen, Jed made one for the calves and yoked them, too. The boy was allowed free use of the tools in the great chest, was lent a hand and shown how at critical times and, if he was redeemed from life in the clouds, and trained to the formation of sound judgments, it was during these two blessed years when he worked with father at the bench under the shed at the back of the log cabin.

In these years Jed's schooling was limited to two weeks one summer. Jed's father preferred to see to his education himself. He had ideas on the subject. In the years ago he had espoused the cause of the phonetic system. He had even started a paper in New York city printed in the phonetic vernacular and using more characters than the alphabet affords. For their accommodation he had made the typesetter's cases with his own hands. Perhaps it was the Pittman-Ellis system, for Jed forgot it all the first opportunity he got, but his father did not cease to take pride in the fact that, as a child, Jed knew all the sounds of the language better than any other child in school. When Jed's father returned from the East in the early spring of '61, where he had gone for "relief" for the "sufferers," beside Robinson Crusoe and the bear book he brought with him an elementary phonetic reader and proceeded to teach Jed how to read by that method, keeping him out of school for that purpose. Jed learned all right and ruined his spelling beyond redemption. Ever after he spelt "accordin' to nature," and when he went to town and the common schools, and the teachers undertook to teach him, as other children were taught, his preliminary training in phonetics caused him infinite humiliation and kept him hovering perilously near to the foot of the spelling class. He was laughed at every school day of his life and grew fairly to hate the sight of the school house.

It is necessary just here to anticipate one of Jed's religious experiences. He studied his spelling lessons hard, but could not remember what the words looked like or how they were spelled. When he was about to despair of his being as smart as other boys, a doubt that was borne in upon him time and again with crushing force during his later childhood, he bethought him to ask the help of his heavenly father that the stigma of daily defeat might be removed from him. For the rest of that term, if not longer, Jed bowed his head over his spelling book and prayed with all the earnestness of helplessness that he might not miss a word that day and—never so much as looked at the spelling lesson once.

From that moment Jed began to climb up in his class and to take occasional headmarks much to the surprise of his teacher, who in the same breath gave expression to her astonishment at his improvement and chided him for past shortcomings, but Jed kept his own counsel, and nothing after that could seriously shake his trust in the efficacy of prayer. A rationalistic explanation of the phenomenon may be that when Jed studied his spelling lesson he tried to remember how the words were constructed, but could not, whereas, when he had not studied his lesson at all, he went at the words that came to him in a common sense way and so sometimes got them right.

Which suggests a second anticipatory incident. Hank Woodley's soldier father brought him a scarf pin when he came home on a furlough. Perhaps it had graced the throat of some impenitent confederate, but, anyhow, it was quite the dearest of Hank's earthly possessions.

Jed and Hank ought not to have gone in swimming Sunday evening. In their hearts they both felt that it was a sinful thing to do, almost as wicked as going fishing on Sunday, while the consequences were like enough to be ever so much more serious.

As they understood the ways of providence toward fishing, the transgression commonly resulted in one miraculous catch of fishes, after which the fisher would never again, in all his life, have any luck at fishing, either on Sundays or on week days. Such instances were well authenticated, not only on the playgrounds at the public school, but in the solemn conferences with the teachers at the Sunday school. Nevertheless, whenever the buds on the willows began to burst forth in the spring the boys were tempted to steal out the back door with hook and line to see if providence would take a dare.

As for going in swimming on Sunday there could be no question. It surely was tempting providence. Never a season passed that these two rivers, the Sandy and the Indigo, jointly or severally, did not claim one or more victims and, as the years passed on and recollection became correspondingly uncertain, evidence accumulated and preponderated to the effect that the drownings had nearly always taken place on Sunday.

But the waters of the Indigo did gurgle so lovingly around the nose of the little break-water that hot summer evening! The temptation was not to be resisted, and Hank and Jed slipped off their clothing and plunged into the blue depths with little haggling over their qualms of conscience. They heaped their clothing on a little pile of water-worn rocks that jutted out of the sand and shingle and had their swim, coming out after a half hour or so of ducking, water-fighting, diving under or off the boats moored to the bank—came out when wearied of the exertion, and dressed. All was well until Hank came to don his scarf. The precious pin was gone.

Hank looked for it as best he could, now that the spot was in the shadow of the high bank and tall trees, felt for it diligently with his delicately tapered, supple fingers, of which he was excessively proud. (They stood him in good stead when, in after years, he developed into a more than usually successful confidence man and tin-horn gambler.) He burned all the matches he had in vain, lost his temper and began to swear.

Now Hank stuttered horribly except when under stress of necessity for making his meaning clear. Then he could be voluble. His tongue was loosened and became as facile as his fingers. He ripped out all the oaths he knew, and he knew all that were current in his time, ran his fingers over the keys of a piano, with rapidity and in desperation. All was vain.

It flashed into his mind that Jed, who had been searching also, might have found the pin and stolen it. The accusation was hotly made and indignantly resented. A few names were interchanged, then fists flew. This happened anywhere from once to a half dozen times a day when these two lads were thrown together. Nearly always their relations were strained, but, like two little bulls on the range, if they fought viciously one instant, they were cropping the grass in peace side by side the very next. It was so this time. Hank cried "king's excuse" so that he might hunt again for his scarf pin and hostilities ceased, but Jed took a seat on the bank and refused to join in the search.

Hank, refreshed by the combat, flew at the rock pile again and felt in and out of every crevice, lost his pride and self possession, lifted up his voice and boohooed so that he might have been heard half a block. He was now fairly beside himself, pleaded with Jed to come and help him because his eyes were so full of tears that he could not see anything at all. Jed softened toward him in the plenitude of his sorrow, but his efforts, too, were vain, and Hank gave himself up to despair, threw himself on the sand and sobbed his misery out in sheer heartbreak.

Then Jed bethought him of the efficacy of prayer and broached the subject to Hank, telling him how prayer would move mountains if only one had faith, as he had learned that very morning in Sunday school, venturing the opinion that nothing would be easier than for God, who sees all things, to look down out of heaven and see just where that scarf pin was and guide Hank's fingers to it. Hank admitted reluctantly that this might be all true enough if he had not been swearing like a trooper for half an hour, but Jed affirmed that God would forgive him for that, too, if he asked him real nice before broaching the subject of the scarf pin.

Hank caught at the spark of hope held out to him with the desperation of despair, knelt bolt upright on the shingle where he was and began to mumble something inaudible to Jed, who reclined against the bank a dozen feet away.

"A lot of good that kind of praying will do," Jed declared, "pears like you are ashamed to be caught at it."

"Well, I ain't no Judge Piper leading a revival," returned Hank, "and I reckon God can hear me when I whisper as well as if I yelled at the top of my voice."

"Yes, but you're ashamed of him, and God won't listen to nobody who is ashamed to be heard calling upon his name."

"I ain't either ashamed," Hank returned hotly, "that's one of your infernal dam lies."

"You are, too, but you weren't ashamed to cuss so loud that you could be heard clear across the river, and when you 'bellered' you weren't ashamed somebody might hear you down town. If you expect God to pay any attention to you you have got to pray just as loud as you cussed and as loud as you 'bellered.' If you don't do it I'm goin' home," declared Jed, moving toward the path, "it won't be no use to stay any longer."

"Hold on!" Hank called. "I'll try it, but if you ever tell on me I'll lick the stuffing out of you," he declared, springing to his feet, with a warning shake of his ever ready fist.

Jed promised that he would never say a word, "cross my heart in sacred honor," and Hank knelt again and put up his hands in an attitude of prayer. At first he stammered woefully and got his words so mixed that they didn't make sense, but, with the realization of what was at stake, he warmed to the work, his tongue was loosened and he prayed with all the fervor of Elisha Lamprey at class meeting.

The humor of it struck Jed, and he turned his face to the bank, stuffed his handkerchief into his mouth and held his sides to keep from exploding. He prayed, too, prayed that a band of "kids" might come down the path and catch Hank—cussing, fighting, irreverent Hank—praying for the forgiveness of his sins in one breath, and, in the next, that he might find his lost scarf pin. Hank promised the Lord that if he would only help him find that scarf pin he would never use another cuss-word as long as he lived, would never go fishing or in swimming again on Sunday, and would even stop fighting if the other kids would let him alone.

In his zeal and highly wrought state of mind he threshed about more than was necessary, felt something prick him sharply between the toes and sprang to his feet with a cry of pain, under the impression that a snake had bitten him. It was his scarf pin which, somehow, had slidden into a crevice, point up, and which had been thrust far enough into the skin to cling to the boy's foot.

The gladdest boy in the world just then was Hank Woodley. The success of the prayer test sobered both of the boys, and they walked home solemnly convinced that they had witnessed a miraculous answer to prayer, notwithstanding extreme provocation to the contrary and, as for Hank, he committed himself unreservedly to the straight and narrow way for the future. He asked Jed to forgive him for accusing him wrongfully, and exacted a second pledge, "cross the heart in sacred honor," never to tell of what had transpired at the river. Jed forgave and renewed his assurances of secrecy. The boys looked up, the stars looked down, the moonlight danced along the streets of the little town and the southeast breeze blew caressingly against their faces as they pattered along with shoeless feet. There appeared to be as much joy on earth as in heaven over the penitence of about as variegated a sinner as was ever turned loose in a small frontier town.

Alack and alas! How can good resolutions survive the deceitfulness of forgetfulness in the hurly-burly of the playground when the rivers and the woods, the melon patches that have been watched from early spring, and the peach orchards with ripening fruit, do everywhere beset one to lure him to his fall? The very next afternoon, while Hank, Jed and "Packy" King were after the cows, they raided the Piper melon patch and, having eaten their fill, Hank began to plug green melons and tear up vines, at which, with sticks in their hands, "Packy" and Jed protested while Hank threatened to carve them with his knife if they came near, but they chased him out of the patch and into the timber and then resumed their hunt for the cows. Of course this incident absolved Jed from his pledge of secrecy! He told "Packy" all about the impromptu prayer meeting held on the brink of the river the night before and "Packy" told everybody, and, until he left the country for parts unknown, Hank went by the name of "Parson" Woodley. It was written in the book of fate that the next time Hank and Jed met there would be a fight, and there was, perhaps the fiercest of their indefinite series, but they were in swimming again at the selfsame spot on the very next Sunday evening, notwithstanding that they had scratched into the alluvial bank under where the swallows nested ineffaceable records of having had as many as seven separate swims on the Saturday before. As often as they went out and dressed they would have a dust fight with the impalpable powder to which the teams had reduced the roads leading back to town, and so had to return to the water to get clean.

Then, too, in the cooled-off counsel of unhurried judgment, Hank concluded that where prayer and swear were so inextricably mixed, as in his case, it was unreasonable to suppose that God would leave his other business to pay much attention to either the one or the other, that the finding of the scarf pin just happened and that was all there was to it, but Jed held firmly, albeit not very reverently, to his faith in the efficacy of prayer, for had he not seen the test tested out?

It seemed to him unquestionable that Hank Woodley's prayer had been answered and unreasonable to suppose that if prayer from such a source was answered anyone else need ask in vain. Therefore, without ceasing and in fullness of faith Jed prayed for a shotgun and setter pup. So life went on as before. Hank went around with hands clinched so that he could get into action without loss of time if any emergency required fists, and Jed's creature comforts continued to demand more than an abnormal capacity for "finding" things could supply without arousing parental solicitude.

But all this is away ahead of the hounds and has not the faintest connection with Jed's encounter with "Old Crop-Ear," the big gray wolf of the Serpentine, and yet, among all the "Recollections of Jed," few stand out more clearly than that.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

An Old Order That Changeth Not

We, in California, are on the eve of a great event. The direct primary is to be given its first trial. If the test of trial shall warrant it other states, very likely all the other states in the Union, may follow, more or less closely, California's example. In view of the importance of the event so near at hand it may not be amiss to devote this lesson, and the one succeeding it, to some of those aspects of the impending crisis that are not partisan in their nature, but only intensely human.

In her autobiography, running in the American magazine, that splendid woman, Jane Addams, makes this reference to the passion play seen ten years ago at Oberammergau: "The peasants portrayed exactly the successive scenes of the Wonderful Life, using only the very words found in the accepted version of the Gospels, yet curiously modernizing and reorienting the message. They made it clear that the opposition to the Young Teacher sprang from the merchants whose traffic in the temple he had disturbed and from the pharisees who were dependent upon the merchants for support. The query of the pharisees was curiously familiar, as they demanded the antecedents of the Radical who dared to touch vested interests, who presumed to dictate the morality of trade and who insulted the marts of honest merchants by calling them a 'den of thieves.' As the play developed it became clear that this powerful opposition had friends in church and state, that they controlled influences which ramified in all directions; their very position in the community gave their statement weight, that the young Agitator must be done away with in order that the highest interests of society might be conserved. These simple peasants made it clear that it was the 'money power' which induced one of the Agitator's closest friends to betray him, and that the villain of the piece, Judas himself, was only a man so dazzled by money that he was perpetually blind to the spiritual vision unrolling before him."

This is the old order that remains changeless through the ages. The powerful are they who hold economic forces in their hands, forces that represent business, commerce, transportation, banking, stocks and bonds, opportunity to labor. To fight their battles, they call upon all those who are dependent upon them for their support. They resist change. No forward step is taken except as these are crowded aside by an upheaval of evolutionary forces resident within the race, usually led by some "radical," some "agitator," some "disturber." The Christ was not the only one of these to be put to death for daring to espouse the cause of humanity as against the supposed interests of established wrong and vested iniquity.

It does not follow that the merchants in the temple, and the pharisees who were dependent upon them for support, appreciated that they were in the wrong and that the young "Radical," and "Agitator" was in the right. They only knew that he was "hurting business" and that, in self defense, they must put him out of the way. It was not easy for them to understand that business did not come first, that it did not outrank justice and mercy, purity and patriotism, the Rights of Man, the uplifting of the race. They did not realize that the special privileges they enjoyed meant a special bondage inflicted upon others against their will.

But we, of this generation, ought to know that the common good is the greater good, that there are higher concerns than commercial prosperity, although it will be seldom if ever that any measure of advantage to humanity can be a hindrance to prosperity. It will only seem so to the shortsighted. If any interest be hurt, it will be the interest that deserves to be hurt and must be hurt if the race is to be saved from hurt. We have had nineteen centuries of that light which lighteth the world in which our progenitors could

Now in every campaign that has ever been or ever will be, this old issue between selfishness on one side and regard for the common weal on the other, between special privilege and equality of opportunity for all, between the downward pressure of that money hunger that made Judas abominable forever and some courageous apostle of liberty, equality and fraternity, will be fought over as though it were being fought for the first time and to be determined once for all. It was fought the first time when the first man oppressed his brother and took for himself a part of his earnings, and the final battle over that issue will not have been fought until flesh shall have become spirit and the millenium shall have dawned.

The purpose of this lesson in The School for Citizenship, is to admonish the youth, who has but lately had the powers and dignities of citizenship conferred upon him, to look well before he votes to see upon which side of this age-old struggle he is enlisted. If he will look into this issue as he would look into a commercial proposal he will hardly have to look a second time before finding a moral issue involved, an issue that will force him to make choice betwixt good and evil, justice and injustice, between service to the few and service to the many, between selfish privilege and the common welfare. Look to it.

Mrs. Heyworth Mills was hauled to the top of St. Peter's Church in Morristown, N. J., the other day to complete a detail in the statue of St. Peter which she made in Florence, Italy. With her tools under her arm she was tied in an iron bucket and hoisted to the statue, where she worked for more than two hours in a drizzling rain chiselling out a fold in the stone robe of the statue.

It Is Business

POLITICS IS GOVERNMENT and government is business. It is just as much your business as your business is your business, and if you let some one else attend to your political business for you you will have no political business to attend to as surely as you would be without your regular business if you let some busybody attend to your regular business for his business advantage rather than for your own. Therefore find out how you ought to vote, and vote!

Lawlor's One Fault

JUDGE W. P. LAWLOR has a fault. It is that he was so fearful that the defense in the graft cases might find excuse for alleging partisan bias against him that he suffered the attorneys therefor to treat his court with all the contempt they knew how to manifest daily for months, even years. He should have kept relays of attorneys on the way to and from prison until they had learned to respect the majesty of justice. If he needed to re-enforce incarcerations with the physical use of a hickory baseball bat he should have used that. He was patient long after patience had ceased to have any virtue left in it. For that Judge Lawlor was at fault. It was his only fault.

At Last

AFTER MONTHS AND YEARS of deserving three contumacious attorneys go to jail for five days. So far so good. But from their sequestration they issue a contemptuous tirade against the judge who committed them. If Judge Lawlor has power he should hale them before him for that and give them another dose of the same, repeating as patients and patience require until they manifest a willingness to eat out of his hand. It is not true, as asserted in their published screed, that a lawyer's first duty is to his client. As an officer of the court his first duty is to see that justice is established, and whoso strives to break justice down should be disbarred and cast out neck and heels. In the graft cases Justice has been deliberately and premeditatedly crushed.

Harvey W. Scott

NO SAN FRANCISCAN EVER SAW a copy of the "Oregonian" without the wish that San Francisco might have such a paper. San Francisco has, and has had, good newspaper men, but by some mischance the ownership of its daily press has been despicable. Harvey W. Scott had his loves and his hates and they were strong, but there was an innate honesty of mind in him that prevented his becoming a journalistic harlot. If, in advancing years, he was unable to keep step with the progressive spirit of his state, or to appreciate that spirit, the fault may be forgiven him. Only now and again a man grows old without growing ultra-conservative. At least Scott was a Man and he has made for himself A Name. Of the owner of what San Francisco paper can as much be said?

The Getter and the Forgetter

BETWEEN THE MAN WHO VOWS to "get" his enemy and "do" him, expressions heard every day, and the man whose untrained mind is likely to be a blank at crucial moments, the hazards of life are much increased. Of the first the attempted assassination of Mayor Gaynor of New York, a most lamentable occurrence, affords an example. Of the second, the so-called "accident" at Ignacio was one among a hundred other similar, yearly instances. Against the first there is no protection except the gradual moralization of the race. Against the second there can and should be a mechanical safeguarding of life that shall not leave life wholly at the mercy of that occasional forgetfulness that besets the best of us and which no amount of training can wholly prevent. Automatic appliances will sometimes fail to act and memory may come to the rescue, or memory may fail and the appliance save, but no railroad is well conducted, or free from blame, where appliance does not re-enforce memory and memory appliance.

The Size of Our Job

A WEEK HENCE we shall all know the size of the job undertaken when the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League undertook to make California free. It looks like a winning fight, but every fight made for Right Things makes headway toward Right Things whether or not that particular fight wins. The California Weekly has done its best. It has no excuses to make or apologies to offer. Therefore, with malice toward none and charity for all, hurrah for Hiram Johnson, William Kent and the ticket they are running on!

Lo! the Rich Indian

THE OKLAHOMA INDIANS are fat, "sassy" and rich. Also rich picking. Swarms of patriotic gentlemen have united to separate the Indians from their lands and then from the money their lands may fetch. Although there are "millions in it" so many are involved that the sum total divided by the number of thieves may reduce the delinquency of each to petty larceny. All deny complicity. Or their plea is that it isn't stealing to rob an Indian or, if it is, it oughtn't to be. That would hurt business. And the administration has sent Ormsby McHarg down to straighten the tangles out! What a conservationist was that to conserve the interests of a race perennially in its minority. How that Ballinger does love a joke!

So Say We All

The Outlook, 287 Fourth Avenue, New York.
August 5, 1910.

Office of Theodore Roosevelt.

My dear Kent: I am glad to get your letter. I shall read your speech at once.

Do you need to assure me, my dear fellow, that you never acted improperly in connection with fencing government lands? I know you too well to believe any such story for a moment. The charge seems to me additionally absurd in view of the fact that you have been one of the leaders in the fight for national forestry and grazing lease laws under which you yourself and all other stock men would have to pay the nation for grazing on the unfenced government's pasture which you now enjoy rent free.

Faithfully yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Hon. William Kent, Kentfield,
Marin County, Cal.

Things to Remember Tuesday

That a vote for Hiram W. Johnson is a vote to make California free.

That A. J. Wallace is Johnson's running mate and entitled to receive as many votes as Johnson.

That if anyone believes in electing United States senators by direct vote of the people now is the time to show the faith that is in him, inasmuch as the advisory vote, even by districts, is only about two removes from the real thing. That John D. Works is the only free candidate running; that he has declared himself on every issue raised, answered every question asked and stood out on the firing line for five months while his adversaries laid low and said nothing.

That it is as important to have a free legislature as a free executive and that the legislative list, elsewhere in this paper, vouched for by The California Weekly, is the one that should be elected.

That whoever controls the party organization will control the party, and that whoever controls the party in power will control the government. Therefore, see to it that none but the best men are chosen as delegates to county conventions. Those conventions will send delegates to a state convention and the state conventions will elect the State Committee, the governing body of the party. Mr. Herrin is after that committee.

That the Nation is watching to see what California does for a Progressive Republicanism, especially in the second and eighth congressional districts, where a square toed fight is being made between "insurgents" and "regulars."

That the Lincoln-Roosevelt League is the only organization or association that has dared either to offer the Men of California a complete Republican state ticket or to come right out in the open and declare what those candidates stand for. All the others have hulked or skulked or winked 'em slyly. The whole ticket should be nominated from top to bottom.

It Was Ballinger's Work

The published letter from the President's secretary to Mr. William Kent, in the matter of the Golconda fences, makes these facts evident: The Department of Justice was asked by Secretary Ballinger to begin civil proceedings against the Golconda Cattle company, charged with illegal fencing, December 14, 1909. The Department of Justice referred the matter to the District Attorney of Nevada, who did not get around to it. On July 26th, when Mr. Kent was actively engaged in his campaign for the Republican nomination for congress, Ballinger bethought him of this ground for an embarrassing suit and urged action upon the Department of Justice, which department obligingly proceeded to have the suit instituted.

"Although the papers do not show that any demand was made upon the company before suit was requested, by the Secretary of the Interior," so runs the letter, "the Department believes from oral statements made by the United States Attorney that the company has for some time been cognizant that proceedings by the government were in contemplation."

In the natural course of events, if the government's agents thought that the fence law was being violated, its agent on the ground would have so informed the superintendent of the Golconda ranch and would have told him to take the fences off. According to an affidavit of the superintendent of the ranch this was never done and objection was never made, for the very good reason that there never has been anything more than a technical violation of the law, if any at all, as is more fully explained elsewhere in this paper.

The letter from the President's secretary contains one clause of bland innocence quite characteristic of the Man with the Pervasive Smile that should not be overlooked. It is this: "The Department believes that no sinister motive is to be attributed to the United States Attorney."

Of course not. The sinister motive is to be attributed to the man who wears the most sinister looking visage yet seen in public print, the Honorable, the Secretary of the Interior, Richard Achilles Ballinger. Mr. Kent never did anything to the United States Attorney for Nevada, but Mr. Kent did take an active part in the prosecution of Ballinger and in his exposure for unfaithfulness to the conservation policies whose cause he had pretended to espouse. Ballinger evidently saw his chance and made the best, and the worst, of it. The President looks on unperturbed, as usual, quite confident that Ballinger doeth all things well.

The Commission In Government

It was President Hadley who affirmed that if free government is to prove successful it will be because the citizen will learn to relinquish to experts those functions of government which require the services of specialists if they are to be satisfactorily performed. That is, the citizen must be content to undertake to do only those things that he can do, and must leave to others the things that he cannot. That is not to be gainsaid.

Former President Roosevelt, in a signed editorial in the New York Outlook, applies the same principle to the executive and legislative departments of government. The president of a nation of a hundred millions of people must leave to subordinates the greater share of his executive duties, and the success or failure of his administration will depend on the acumen with which those subordinates are selected.

So with congress. It must, in the opinion of Colonel Roosevelt, leave to commissions of experts the functions of laying out systems of river and harbor improvements and the preparation of tariff schedules. Congress can lay out systems of internal improvements or make tariff schedules only by employing log-rolling methods and log-rolling methods produce results at once grotesquely immoral and immorally grotesque.

The reason why congress did not apply the Republican tariff-making principle to the making of the Payne-Aldrich tariff was that it could not. Four hundred and eighty-three men cannot compare rate with rate, cost with cost, price with price, covering the thousands of commodities that enter into modern consumption, but they can log-roll to beat a colored band. And they like to log-roll. It has in it something of the fascination of the stock exchange and wheat pit. They will be loth to give it up, but they will have to. When the public shall have been brought to see the truth as Theodore Roosevelt sees it the change of method will be made. Then we shall have use for commissions of experts whose work congress will examine and approve, but will not undertake to do.

It is unfortunate that upon the heels of Colonel Roosevelt's editorial in the Outlook the President should have seen fit to give out an authorized interview in which he took ground against a tariff commission and made it clear that he desired only a tariff board empowered to gather information for the advice of congress. There is a difference there which may be made as broad as a barn door or deep as a well. It will be important to watch that commission. The President will have the politicians with him. With no logs to roll a congressional career will be less exhilarating. But the sober second thought of the American people will take the view of Theodore Roosevelt, that what congress cannot do, and do right, it must relinquish to some smaller, more expert and specially equipped body. Commissioners are destined to play an increasingly important part in government, for the very good reason that a commission can act.

Dangerous

It is true that the prosperity of a railroad is important to the prosperity of the employees of that railroad, although it does not always follow that the stockholders in a prosperous railroad are as ready to share their prosperity with their employees as they are their adversities.

But this is not saying that it is wise for railroad employees to so organize politically as to cast their ballots with solidarity in the interests of the employing corporation. Nothing has occurred during the campaign just closing more calculated to estrange the general public from the railroad employees than the attempt to solidify them for the ticket espoused by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company.

The interests of railroad employees in the prosperity of their employing companies is not greater than the interests of the general public in its own prosperity. If railroads are charging all that the traffic will bear, that they may pay high wages and big dividends, it at once becomes the public interest to see to it that railroads charge no more than reasonable rates for services rendered that they may pay reasonable wages and reasonable dividends only. The advent of railroad employees into politics, en bloc, is, if persisted in, certain to solidify the consuming public for its own protection against both railroads and their too devoted employees.

If the railroad employe, has hitherto had the hearty sympathy of the general public it was because he has been looked upon as, first of all, a free, American citizen and, himself, a part of the general public. He is also a consumer. What is bad for the public cannot be permanently good for him, and the greatest misfortune that can befall him is to make himself a part of that political mechanism that, known as the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, has overthrown free government in this state.

In vain may the managers of the Working Railroad Men's Joint Legislative Board point to the fact that Curry, and not Anderson, was endorsed by their organization. Not once in all his political life has Charles F. Curry lifted his voice against railroad domination of the political life of this state. On the contrary, from 1894, when Curry ran for county clerk of San Francisco, until 1906, when he was last nominated for secretary of state, he has taken no step without being boosted by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. It is not that Mr. Herrin loves Curry less, but only Anderson more. The rest of the ticket endorsed tells the story. Mattison, McGowan, Harry Melvin, Duncan McKinlay, Summerland, McLachlan, every man of them bearing the Espee stamp. The endorsement of W. R. Williams for state treasurer deceives no one, for he has no opposition.

There is that about this whole business that is dangerous. Employes of railroads will do well to make it clear that they are first of all citizens and free citizens at that. The place to do this is at the ballot box.

Our Way Best

The trouble that Spain and Portugal are having with the Vatican concerns us only as a significant event of our time. A "concordat" is an agreement between the Papal See and a government of a state or nation for the regulation of ecclesiastical affairs and it implies that the Papacy is a state, that it sends to, and receives from, other capitals diplomatic representatives; that treaties are entered into as, for instance, between Spain and the United States or between the United States and Great Britain. It implies, if it does not assert, the temporal power of the Papacy.

By the terms of the concordat, entered into between Spain and the Vatican in 1851, it was mutually agreed by the High Contracting Parties that "The Catholic religion, to the exclusion of every other denomination, shall continue to be the religion of the Spanish nation, and shall be maintained throughout the dominion of His Catholic Majesty," and that "this concordat shall for ever remain in force as a law of the states in the possession of the Crown." It is further provided that, "Should any difficulty arise in the future it shall be settled by mutual agreement between the Holy Father and His Majesty."

It is not a matter of concern to this paper as to who first broke the above agreement. Very likely the Spanish government did. Protestant denominations had established churches in Spain and had displayed their insignia in contravention of the concordat. The Spanish ministry made an order that permitted this to be done, whereupon the Vatican broke off negotiations for the reformation of the concordat by agreement.

If an agreement, running forever, can be modified or abrogated only by agreement, and one of the parties will not agree to its abrogation, then the other has no choice except to endure it or abrogate it. That is what France did, what Spain is doing and what Portugal seems likely to do. It is time that civilization ended the whole mediaeval vestige of Papal temporality and disestablished all established religions. America has shown the better way. It has maintained no representative at the Vatican, and will maintain none, but it gives the open door to Catholic and Protestant, Hebrew and Confucian, to take their several messages to the people without hindrance and without special privilege. Not one Catholic in ten thousand in this country would have it otherwise if he could.

In England the coronation oath of the King has been so far modied as to eliminate an unkind and unnecessary reflection upon the Catholic church, but it stopped short of doing impartial justice inasmuch as it retained the pledge to Protestantism. That also is a survival from a mediaeval age of religious rancor. The oath should have been further modified to express a dependence upon God and loyalty to the nation, and that should suffice. England should disestablish its religion. The American way is the better way. May all the nations follow our lead. Otherwise the tranquility of the nations will be endangered.

Order Out of Chaos

It has long been the plaint of Representative S. C. Smith, voiced through his paper, the Echo, at Bakersfield, that "insurgency" is without form and void, that it is a wind that bloweth where it listeth, but that it comes from nowhere and goes nowhere in particular, and is nothing more than a symptom of internal discomfort. He wants "insurgency" reduced to orderly statement, to a political creed and catechism. Until this is done he prefers to play with the "regulars" who know what they are doing and why they are doing it.

The Honorable Sylvester C. Smith is mistaken. The insurgents are Republicans. The Republican national platform is their platform. When the "regulars," in control of the machinery of the party, undertook to legislate in contravention of that platform Republicans who were loyal to their party pledges, and had the courage of their convictions, first protested and then "insurgued." They forced the fight and won a substantial victory. It is regrettable that Smith did not help.

In this state the same spirit has manifested itself in statement as specific and positive as language can make it. It has resolved that, By the Eternal, the Men of this state shall rule the state and the railroads shall not. Does Mr. Smith want anything more specific than that? This victory won, other victories for just government will follow. Until this is won no other can follow. One fight at a time, Mr. Smith.

If there be an inchoate purpose underneath this spirit of insurgency, not yet reduced to orderly statement, it is this: That no longer shall the wealth of all of us be given in fee simple to a part of us to be used by the privileged few for the mulcting of the millions forever.

In the mind of every American, not under domination of some privileged autocrat or corporation, that determination has taken definite form. The details of carrying it into effect have not been worked out. They will be. The remedy will begin with governmental supervision and control and may end with the democratization of industry. It does not yet appear what the end shall be, and it is unreasonable in Mr. Smith to demand that the progressive element in our civic life shall, at the close of the first decade of the new century, foreknow and foretell what the close of the last decade of the century shall witness. It is sufficient to know that we are marching toward a more equitable division of the products of industry and that our backs have been turned upon the spoils system as applied to industry as certainly as upon the spoils system as applied to government.

The place for Sylvester C. Smith is in the ranks at the head of some column rather than standing upon the curbstone watching the marching hosts go by.

The Bluffers

The last Republican national platform asserted that the measure of protection to home industries should be the difference between labor cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American producers. For sticking their tariff peg right there, and insisting that tariff schedules should be revised according to that rule for revision, the "regulars" have sought to read the insurgents out of the Republican party as not good protectionists. And they are so solemnly, unctuously patriotic about it, too. It makes one laugh. A precious lot of bluffers! But their bluff will not work in this year of Our Lord.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

The story written by an amateur must have an agreeable ending or it will never have vogue, but a Balzac or a Hugo can go through the characters he has created with fire and sword and yet be read by generations succeeding generations. A play, to draw crowded houses, must bring everything out pleasantly in the last act, but Shakespeare may make a shambles of the stage and yet hold his primacy as the greatest dramatist of the centuries. Ibsen is unintelligible to most persons, and yet his plays are growing upon the favor of the civilized world as those of no other playwright of modern times.

And why? Because the master mind sees the truth through and through and has the courage to make others see it, while the weak fear to go forward when they find the truth leading toward dark shadows and unknown depths. They turn aside to pleasanter paths without caring how falsely those paths may lead or how falsely the leader leads those who follow him.

The strong are few, the many weak. The crowd turns aside from the truth when it plunges into unknown regions. Is there a voice thundering from Sinai, "Thou shalt not steal?" The strong accept it in its fullness. The weak modify it to mean that one is not to pick another's pockets directly through slipping the hand in and taking one's purse out, but that it isn't so very bad to sell short weight, or short measure, or an adulterated article and so reach the pocket, incidentally extracting from the purse little by little instead of the whole at a single swoop.

Does the voice come from the mountain, so that the mountain trembles and those within hearing fall upon their faces, "Thou shalt not commit adultery?" The strong accept it as given, bluntly, unequivocally, without palliation or extenuation. The weak read it to mean not offensively, in so public a way as to occasion scandal, only in youth or when away from one's home, or with the poor or the friendless, or in the event that one is expecting an addition to one's family, or that it was intended for women only and not for men, or unless someone else has been accommodated before and is likely to be afterward. In the minds of many the unequivocal command has become so modified, and has so many exceptions to the rule, as to be applicable only to femininity and sterility.

"Thou shalt not bear false witness!" No, assuredly not, that is unless you are very angry at your neighbor or think that he has injured you, or unless he is unpopular in the community, or your bread and butter is on the other side, or partisan feeling is tense, or your neighbor is your friend or relative and is in danger of going to prison for crimes committed, then you may bear false witness for him if not against.

What difference should it make with us whether or not we accept the language of the Decalogue as having been thundered from Sinai, or as coming adown the ages as the epitome of wisdom and experience of countless millions who have seen the issue tried countless times? What care we whether the language was graven on pillars of stone or in the hearts of generations succeeding generations through the centuries? What we are concerned for is to know whether or not these truths are true as they are stated or as they are modified to suit our predilections, our weaknesses, our convenience.

Only cowardice doubts. The master minds of the world have not equivocated, palliated or extenuated. They have declared the verities of life to be eternal. They have avowed that conduct is to be judged by absolute standards; that the moral laws are as inexorable as the natural laws, which never yet turned aside from the direct line to suit the whims or accommodate the necessities of anyone. To hold to anything less than absolute standards of conduct is to make confession of moral weakness and mental imbecility.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Latest in Airships of War

Germany, ever prompt to seize upon anything which promises success in the red science of war, is about to experiment with a new battleship of the air. The first test will be made by Count Frederick von Moltke, a nephew of the great field marshal, and if it is successful the government will bear the expense of preparation of a fleet. The proposed aerial warship will be a dirigible of the Zorn type, and also it will be something of a wonder, if it does what is claimed for it. Like some varieties of worms, it will be divisible (into three parts), and each part will be capable of separate existence and locomotion. It is calculated that it will operate in the following manner in time of battle: Laden with small guns and bombs, the great dirigible will arrive over the camp of the enemy, on whom there soon will be raining something different from violets. Shortly it will be desirable to send despatches, photographs, etc., back to headquarters; whereupon the front segment of the vessel will be detached (it will require but two minutes), and the detached segment will float toward the general's tent, while the rest of the vessel continues to emphasize its remarks to the enemy with bombs. If desirable, another segment can be detached, and still the remaining segment will continue to exasperate the enemy with bombs. That such an airship might be very murderous in time of war is evident, and hence, as all of our "Christian" nations admit by their deeds, it would be decidedly desirable, for how could civilization exist if men had no means of slaughtering other men?

Quietus For Legislative Orators

Yamaskama is his name, and may the name be honored wherever are found lawmakers who deal in words and words and words. Yamaskama, as his name might indicate, is a Japanese, and he also is an engineer. Possibly in the latter capacity, he has invented an Oratory-Suppressor which should prove to be a boon to all who suffer from a surfeit of legislative rhetoric. It works in this way: Attached to each statesman's desk is a metal tube which leads, by a system of other tubes, to receptacles beneath the seats of all members; also each member is given a number of leaden balls. An honorable member takes the floor to address the other honorable members concerning an appropriation for his constituency at Squeedonk, or something of that sort. The other honorable members listen until, at length, one of them has had enough of Squeedonk; then he drops a ball in the tube leading to the receptacle beneath the honorable orator's desk. Gradually other honorable members weary of Squeedonk and drop their marbles. As soon as more than half have done so the mechanism operates, a trap-door beneath the orator's desk lowers, and, still gesticulating violently, the orator is carried to the subterranean regions. Then another honorable member takes the floor and his chances at the same time. And we of the Caucasian race have suffered a "little brown man" to conceive this invention, this boon to humanity! We ought to be ashamed of ourselves, but our shame should not interfere with extending to him the honor which is his due.

Birds Benefit More Than Harm

Those energetic citizens who need but observe that a bird is beautiful, or that it has a peculiarly sweet song, in order to be convinced that it should be exterminated at once—such citizens, we say, will find little to encourage them in a recent report issued by the national department of agriculture. Under the auspices of the department a systematic investigation of Californian birds has been made, with the object of definitely ascertaining whether they are injurious or beneficial to farmers and fruit-growers. Seventy varieties of birds were included in the investigation, and it was ascertained that sixty-six of these varieties, including the much-threatened meadow-lark, were helpful rather than harmful, inasmuch as a majority of their food consisted of insect pests rather than of fruits and grains. The four exceptions consist of the linnet, the California jay, the stellar jay and the redbreasted sapsucker, and the utmost that the report says concerning these is that whether they are more harmful or beneficial is doubtful. So stands the authority of Uncle Sam, but it will make no difference with the bird-haters; at the very next session of the legislature their yell—particularly against the sweetest of our songsters, the meadow-lark—probably will be heard no less than it has been heard heretofore.

How Wicked Is London

Sunday at Home, a London publication, has been conducting an inquiry into the moral and spiritual condition of the great city. In so doing, it has largely given the opinions of clergymen as its main authority, and it is rather interesting to examine these opinions as an indication of the trend of the clerical mind, or, at least, of that portion of the clerical mind with which Sunday at Home has dealings. In the first place, to some it will appear somewhat noteworthy that these opinions appear to have little to say about increase or decrease of extreme poverty, vice, etc. On the contrary, they are largely devoted to horrified recognition of increased disregard of the Sunday Sabbath. There is an increasing demand for Sunday restaurants, theatres, etc., say these clerical investigators into public morals, and, in view of this shocking fact, they evidently have not felt able to spare the time to delve into the statistics of vice and penury, which some people suppose to have something to do with the moral and spiritual welfare of a people. Sunday at Home's investigation is of no particular importance, nor would it be mentioned here, save as a sort of Exhibit A of a certain type of clerical mind; a type to which, thank Heaven, there are notable exceptions.

Cost of a Royal Funeral

If we were kings we could not, out of regard for our families, afford ourselves the luxury of dying. At any rate, that is the thought that is likely to strike most of us when we read the items of expense connected with the funeral of King Edward. Of course, on so great and grave an occasion everybody wished to mourn, and mourning, in a regal way, comes high. Witness the following bills which were paid for that purpose: The royal guests desired to mourn, and so did the palace servants, and so $19,000 was allowed for the indication of their grief. While the royal guests were mourning they had to be entertained; item, $28,000. The officers and men of the navy wanted to mourn; cost of their grief, $19,000. The soldiers felt mournful; price of their sadness, $65,000. Mourning guests had to go to London to mourn; railway grieving expenses, $23,000. Placing Westminster Hall and St. George's in mourning condition, $40,000. The total expense of all the grief, as will be seen, was $194,000, a funereal sum which would make most of us contemplate death with justifiable regret. After all, this was but the price of "the trappings and the pomp of woe," and it is entirely possible that a four-bit grief might be fully as genuine.

The Horse and the Automobile

The horse still lacks a great deal of being superceded by the automobile, and the latter will have to make vast gains before it will equal in number the vehicles drawn by horses. It is estimated that approximately 350,000 autos are in use in the United States. Considering how recent was the time when the first of these machines made its appearance, this is a large number, but compared with the number of horse-drawn vehicles, it is small.

Best authorities estimate that over 1,000,000 of these horse-drawn vehicles now are in use in this country, or twenty for each automobile. So, notwithstanding the immense output of automobiles, it is evident that the day is distant, if it ever comes, when an automobile will be seen on the highways as often as a wagon or a carriage. And, even during the present invasion by automobiles, it is estimated that about $40,000,000 less annually is invested in them than in vehicles drawn by horses. Yes, the automobile still lacks much of superceding the horse and that which he draws.

The Young Men and the Army

More and more, in recent years, young men of foreign countries are objecting to compulsory service in the army. Of course the reason is not far to seek, for why should they, who neither desire war nor will do anything to foster it, be set up as food for bullets? How rapidly this disaffection grows is indicated by statistics recently published by the French war office. According to these statistics the number of young men who left France just as their term of military service should have begun, and quite evidently to avoid military service, was 4,905 in 1907. In 1908 the number increased to 11,782, much more than doubling itself. In 1909 the number thus leaving the country was 17,258, or well toward quadruple that of but two years earlier. If such straws show which way the current flows, as they presumably do, some of the European countries sooner or later may experience much difficulty in manning their armies.

Italy and Its Lottery

The Italian government makes a very neat sum of money out of the lottery which it runs to bleed—that is, for the benefit of its people. After paying all prizes and all lottery expenses during the year ending with last June, its profit on its gambling game was $18,585,000. Every average man, woman and child in Italy donated 57 cents to make that pretty balance, and the share of each head of a family of five was $2.85—all donated without return, unless that sort of paternal government can be called a return. Profits of $18,585,000—and why should the government consider the morals of the people?

A Patient Little Woman

A patient little woman who had done the best she knew
To lead her loved ones on the path which angels beckon to Passed out beyond the shadows, and came unto the gate
Where all earth's many peoples shall gather soon or late;
And she saw the ones who entered with the lovelight on each brow,
And the ones who stood and trembled, for their deeds accused them now;
And she saw beyond the gateway bright homes the blessed win,
Yet still she stood and waited, nor strove to enter in.

"Come in, come in," an angel urged; "for you the way is clear.
You walked the path of humble love, and Love is sov'reign here.
Hark! Hark unto the anthems that the blessed spirits sing!
Come in; the door is open; come in where Love is king."
But the patient little woman drew the farther from the door,
As she said, "I still must tarry, though forgiveness I implore.
I have prayed—oh, never ceasing—that my loved may Heaven win;
I would wait without the gateway till they all are gathered in."

But, "Nay," the angel murmured, "possess thy soul in trust.
We may not know His purpose, but His ways for aye are just.
No earthly loves need enter in the mansions of the blest,
Where earthly ties are broken and the earthly passions rest."
But the patient little woman shook her patient little head.
"I have toiled for them and loved them; I have yearned o'er them," she said.
"E'en in Heav'n I'd hear their voices, calling me from out life's din—Let me wait outside the gateway till my loved are gathered in."

Still the patient little woman waiteth by the pearly gate,
And sometimes she hears a whisper, "I am coming, mother; wait."
And that whisper cheers her spirit more than all the anthems grand,
As they beat between the portals of the happy Promised Land;
And some day, from out the shadows—for the great Lord God is good—
One by one they'll stand beside her where she long for them has stood,
And the patient little woman to her heritage will win
When, beneath the pearly archway, all her loved ones enter in.

You Must Make Your Choice

You must make your choice. You may take your stand
As one who believes in a freeman's land,
A land unbranded, untagged, unbought,
Whose sons stand straight and are slave to naught;
Or, choosing the baser, your vote may go
To the tyrant knaves who would lay us low,
Heeding nor honor nor duty's voice—
You must make your choice.

You must make your choice. You may be such clods
As kowtow and cringe when a Herrin nods;
You may play the Judas, sell freedom's Christ
For the tinkling coin that your honor priced;
Or, choosing the better, may take your stand
For a freeman's place in a freeman's land,
Vowing your sons shall in you rejoice—
You must make your choice.

A Political Parable

Up in the mountains, near where the counties of Mendocino and Lake snuggle down together in friendly way, a crystal-clear stream trails from valley to valley, adding beauty to a landscape already more than passing beautiful. Down to this stream, after following a winding and dissipated way through the hills, a dusty road at last comes, and crosses the stream either by a bridge which is there or by a ford below the bridge.

Sometimes drovers drive their cattle over the road, down to the stream and across the ford, and then the transparent waters become muddy and polluted, so that a cleanly person might refuse to enter them. But drive out the cattle, and soon the water is limpid and beautiful again.

The stream of Californian political life should be clear and transparent, but long years ago the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau drove its human cattle into it, and since then it has been so foul and polluted that decent men generally have avoided it, holding themselves too clean to step into such black waters. The stream should be limpid, pure and beautiful, but it never will be until the Southern Pacific's political cattle have been driven out of it.

Now certain honorable men, with Hiram Johnson at their head, have determined that the cattle shall be driven out, at whatever cost to themselves, and—

What are you going to do about it?
In which direction would love of your state lead you?

Does regard for your children's welfare dictate a vote for political cleanliness or for continuance of this long-time pollution?

These are the questions that are up to you. None other can answer them for you.
What are you going to do about it?

Thoughtful Man on the Cruel Blow

"Twas a cruel blow," the Thoughtful Man remarked; "twas a crushing and disastrous blow, as my friend, George A. Van Smith observed in his steenth luminous Epistle to the Gullible published in the Call."

"What was the cruel blow?" I inquired.

"The defiant and ungrateful attitude of the railway employees association toward the Grand Old Machine in indorsing nominees whom that Machine bitterly opposes. Ah, how we labored with those ingrates to prevail upon them to do our will! How we besought them! How we implored them with tears in our eyes! But 'twas all in vain; the traitors heeded us not. Ah me! 'twould not have been so before the machine was obliterated, as Mr. Van Smith feelingly remarked."

"Look at what they did. Unheeding the frenzied appeals of the Machine, they indorsed for nomination these unyielding foes of the 'organization': H. A. Melvin for associate justice of the supreme court, Frank MacGowan for attorney-general, Richard Ferris for lieutenant-governor, W. D. Wagner for secretary of state, Frank Mattison for controller and W. D. Shannon for state printer."

"Oh, 'tis a list to strike terror to the hearts of the noble cohorts of the Machine, and you bet it struck. Then, to add the final blow to our fondest hopes, disregarding our tear-wet cheeks and wringing hands, they indorsed Charles F. Curry for governor. We took just one look at the list, and we knew that all was lost. Nevermore would the bright sun of hope rise on the Machine horizon. That list would put any sun out of business. The Machine was obliterated, annihilated, wiped out by the froward employees."

"Perhaps you could overcome this handicap," said I, "by employing 20 or 30 gifted prevaricators to deceive the people."

"We don't need them," the Thoughtful Man replied.

"Why not?" said I.

"We have Van Smith," said he.

A Final Campaign Ditty

Johnson for the first place; we're sure to place him there,
For he doesn't heed the whistle, for the bell he doesn't care.

Johnson for the first place, as anyone can see,
And here's a little ditty that keeps singing unto me:

Anderson for bell-boy,
Stanton janitor,
Curry for the lamb stew,
But not for Governor.

Johnson in the first place; 'tis written in his stars,
For the people all have wearied of the choo-choo cars,
Of the scepter of a Herrin and the corporation crown—
And the ditty's singing, singing, till I have to write it down:

Anderson for bell-boy,
Stanton janitor,
Curry for the lamb stew,
But not for Governor.

EDISON AND HIS WORKSHOP

AND THE METHOD BY WHICH HE PERFECTS HIS INVENTIONS

Thomas A. Edison is the last man in his workshops that the casual visitor would take to be the Thomas A. Edison of so much fame. Of course the face is instantly recognizable, made familiar by countless reproductions of its likeness in the press of all the world. But the figure—this lazy-looking man, standing idly with his hands in his trousers pockets (old-fashioned "front-flap" pockets they are), apparently with less to do than any man in his huge laboratory, and less interested in it than any of them—this the Thomas A. Edison who invented the electric light, the phonograph, the electric storage battery, the concrete house, the hundreds of useful and marvelous things that have made him famous?

Absurd, but true. Edison is physically either inordinately lazy or, what is more probable, he finds that exercise draws blood to feed his muscles that he wants to feed his brains. At any rate, he told the writer that, in thirty years, he had taken only so much exercise as was necessary to walk from his laboratory door to his carriage and from his carriage to the front door of his home.

"But how do you get along without exercise?"

"I don't eat anything," Edison replied. "People need exercise because they load their stomachs with a lot of stuff that requires exercise to aid its digestion. That was all right in the days when our savage ancestors got a square meal only when they caught it and had to eat it all to tide them over till the next quarry was captured. And it is all right for the man who works with his muscles instead of his head. But brainworkers shouldn't eat much or take exercise."

He added that he smoked when he felt like it—a cigar—and that he took one drink a week, a glass of whisky every Saturday night.

This, then, is the regimen of health of a man who has done twenty men's work in his lifetime, and is still working; of a man who, in his prime, often worked thirty-six hours at a stretch, without sleep or rest; of a man whose brain has evolved scores of mechanical and chemical inventions that have contributed incalculably to the comfort of civilized life. It is not exactly the regimen that would be prescribed by the doctors or the physical culturists, and, truth to tell, it has not produced either a Sandow or an Apollo Belvedere, but it has been suited to sustain the mortal frame that houses one of the wonderful minds of modern times, which is perhaps sufficient justification for it. And Edison seems to be satisfied with its results. He has lived ninety to the minute, at exactly the sort of work that interests him.

Now as to his workshop. Writers have so often referred to it as a laboratory that the public probably has a wrong idea both of its size and appearance. In reality, this laboratory is a huge building, three or four hundred feet long and several stories high, and looks exactly like a large factory. Within, the suggestion of a factory is carried out in some parts of the building, of a laboratory in others, and of a studio in others. It should be understood that Edison now does very little of the actual manipulation of the experiments that produce his inventions. He supplies the ideas, and hires assistants to work on them under his personal supervision. For example, he is constantly working to improve the quality of the sound produced by the phonograph, to remove all traces of mechanical action from the tones that issue from the horn. But he himself does little or none of the actual work of making the experiments or testing their results. He hires for this purpose an expert scientist, a former pupil under Helmholtz, the great German physicist. This man is a fine musician. To him is entrusted the responsibility for the oversight of the phonograph experiments. He has at call mechanics, musicians and chemists. To him Edison will give directions to produce certain results by certain means that Edison has concluded will produce those results. After he has given these directions Edison may not see this assistant for two weeks, but the experiments are being made as he intended, and when he returns their results are known and tabulated for him. And, usually, when he returns he has his head full of enough new ideas to keep that department busy for some weeks more.

This method of investigation and experiment by proxy is carried out throughout the great establishment. In the chemical laboratory, experiments with batteries may be under way; in another department, experiments with concrete; in another, experiments with phonographs. The method is perfectly justifiable, because Edison's is the inventive mind that keeps these experiments going, and the inventions that result are directly products of his genius. He has simply applied the modern method of organization and systematization to the business of creative inventing, with the result, as elsewhere, of tremendously increased capacity.

It is well to understand Edison's theory of invention. In the first place, he takes no stock in the ordinary ideas about "inspiration." He has said that "the inspiration point is the perspiration point." That phrase exactly epitomizes his theory and his method. Of course, he starts out with an idea, but even that idea is achieved by no mysterious leap of the imagination, but by a process of close study of what he should work at next. He told the writer that he had no time to fritter away on inventions merely for the sake of science; his sole idea is to supply a pressing economic need. Hence he searches for the thing that needs to be done, the thing for which there is a crying industrial demand. Then he proceeds to work out the problem of supplying the mechanical or chemical invention that will do that thing and do it on a commercially feasible scale.

This point of view of Edison's should be particularly impressed upon the would-be inventor: it is useless to invent something that nobody wants, and it is useless to invent something so expensive to manufacture that nobody can afford to have it. Of course, this latter point is relative: to suggest an exaggerated illustration, a machine that would dig the Panama Canal in a year would be dirt cheap at a million dollars.

The actual process of invention, followed by Edison, is also illuminating. The least possible amount of calculation is permitted to rest with the chance inspirations or genius, and the most possible use is demanded of the powers of patient, plodding experiment. Take Edison's new and very efficient electrical storage battery, for example. The amount of actual experimentation used in perfecting this invention is well-nigh unbelievable. Edison evolved this battery by actually making a battery of every possible combination of elements—within certain necessary limits of size—that he could conceive of. The writer saw in his laboratory row after row of these batteries, hundreds upon hundreds of them, every one different from every other in some detail of materials used or of proportions of one material to another. Boys, trained to the work, walked ceaselessly from battery to battery, testing the strength of current generated by each and making a record of it, and, also, making record of the day and time of day of the test. It was only after years of this sort of experiment, and after Edison had exhausted practically every possible combination of materials and construction, that he chose the one combination that gave the best results and offered to the public the present perfected battery. He did not offer it with the guess of genius that it was the best: he offered it with the certainty of complete experimentation that had proved that every other conceivable combination was less efficient.

The example of the storage battery is exactly of a piece with all of Edison's method of inventing. It is the method of invention by experimentation and the elimination of the unfit. The labor of it is prodigious, but the results have justified the method.

Edison told the writer that he once suffered from rheumatism. When he asked his physician what rheumatism was, the physician replied that it was the result of the formation of uric acid crystals, usually in the joints.

"Why don't you give me something to dissolve the crystals, then?" asked Edison.

"My dear sir," replied the physician, "if you can tell the medical profession what will dissolve uric acid crystals you will perform a tremendous service to the profession and to humanity. Nobody knows."

"Well, I don't know, either," said Edison. "but it won't be but a few days before I will know whether anything in existence will dissolve them."

He went to his laboratory and sent an order to a great firm of wholesale druggists. That order was for a few ounces of every drug in the United States Pharmacopeia, an enormous list of thousands of drugs. He also got a quantity of uric acid crystals, and as many glass tumblers as drugs. In every tumbler he put some of the crystals, and on them he poured the drugs, a different drug to every tumbler, labelling what each was. A few days later he examined the tumblers and found the crystals dissolved in five of the tumblers. In other words, there were five drugs that would dissolve uric acid crystals. Nobody else had ever found them, but Edison found them, by trying all the drugs there are. That, again, exactly illustrates his method of inventing.

One last example of his method: Edison wanted to know, partly, for once, in the interests of pure science, and partly too, for the use it might be to him some day to know, exactly what substances contain radium. The easiest method of determining the presence of radium is to place the substance to be tested on an ordinary photographic dry-plate and leave it in a dark room for some days. The invisible emanations of light from radium affect a dry-plate just as sunlight does, though much more gradually. So Edison bought several thousand dry-plates and placed on each a different substance, a sample of everything he could think of and lay his hands on. He stored the plates away in a light-proof room for several weeks, at the end of which time he had them developed. Every plate showed a reaction from the radium rays, proving to his satisfaction that radium is present in probably all substances.

If this article has given the impression that less credit should be given to Edison's genius than to his persistency, it is only because emphasis has been laid on the side upon which he himself lays it, the side that it is extremely important for young inventors to understand and realize. But when all is said, of course Edison is a natural inventive genius, and it should not be forgotten that his first successful invention was perfected while he was a poor telegraph operator in Boston. This invention, an improvement of the telegraphic ticker service used for stock quotations in Wall street, was bought outright by the Western Union Telegraph Company for $40,000.

So Edison would undoubtedly have achieved distinction as an inventor even if he had not had a genius for organization and for hard work as well. But the power of systematizing his work and of delegating much of the experimental part of it to subordinates has enabled him to do what he could never have done alone, what he has done for years, which is to take out a new patent every two weeks.

Edison is now sixty-three years old. He has received patents for more than 700 inventions. He has been signally honored all over the world. And he has enjoyed vastly a life of unremitting labor, for which the world is a much richer and more convenient and comfortable place in which to live and work.

Senator Charles Dick of Ohio has long iron gray locks that are much admired. He walked into a barber shop recently, removed his panama and sat gently down in one of the vacant chairs. "Well, sir," said the barber, "what show is playing tonight?" The Senator laughed. "I'm playing the Ohio circuit just now," he said.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Important As Presidential Next Tuesday's primary election will be as important to California as any presidential election that was ever held, and the registration over the state indicates that nearly as large a vote may be cast as any presidential election has brought out. This looks good. It is seldom that the forces of civic righteousness are beaten when a full vote is gotten out, and yet we have to know that the slum wards of cities are more fully registered than the "better element" districts, that every vote in those wards will be cast at least once and that they may be counted more than once. The success of the direct primary depends upon the honest citizen getting to the polls. The dishonest will be there every time and, if the honest are not, it will be easier to control a state through the direct primary than under the convention system. The mobilized tenderloin and saloon vote of the cities and towns in the state can be made to hold the balance of power. What shall be done about getting the honest vote out, not this once alone but always?

Too Grievous To Be Borne If such herculean efforts as have been made during this campaign have got to be made at every campaign or have the election go to the bad through default the direct primary will crush itself with its own weight. The direction of least resistance is the direction toward government by special interests and for special interests. Whoever would change that direction, and set the currents flowing toward government by all the people for all the people, has got to do it by lifting dead weight over mountains. No other man in the history of California has carried a message to so many voters as has Hiram W. Johnson, but it has taken him half a year to do it. It was worth while, but the cost in physical effort was such as few could put forth and survive. Because he was in the field carrying his message, the forces of civic evil were forced to be active, too, with the result that California has done little for six months besides talk, think, write, read and "do" politics. It takes time and effort to educate public sentiment. It takes no time and little effort to "pass the word down the line" of political hangers-on and so achieve a victory over patriotism caught napping. Again, what can be done to force each citizen to discharge his duties as a citizen or cease to be a citizen? Inducing, educating and coaxing are too laborious and too costly to be endured by the relatively few, and relatively poor, upon whose shoulders the burden generally rests.

Confessedly Hard To Understand The Watchman has endeavored to keep his readers informed as to what was actually doing in California politics. So far as the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League is concerned that has been easy enough, inasmuch as The Watchman has enjoyed the confidence of the chief movers in that League, and inasmuch as whatever was done was done openly. Two hundred Republicans of known progressive tendencies were invited to a conference, and about one hundred of them came, an organization was effected, a committee chosen to make up a ticket representative of sentiments expressed in a platform of principles and the ticket was made and offered the public. The other candidacies were all closed corporations. The few got together, as they had a right to do, and put candidates into the running. What those candidates stand for must be inferred from the guarded expressions of most of them and from the characters of their backers. Excluding Mr. Ellery, who is the joke of the season, all the gubernatorial candidates, save Mr. Johnson, are tarred with the Southern Pacific stick, and no one, except Mr. Herrin and Satan himself, now knows to whom the controllable, deliverable, tenderloin and barkeepers' vote will be delivered. That may amount to 10,000 votes in the state. Normally it is a Curry vote. It will go to Anderson, Curry or Stanton, whichever, not later than Saturday of this week, stands the best chance of beating Johnson. Which? Frankly, The Watchman does not know, but is inclined to think that it will go to Curry. Unless bought and paid for in some other's interest he will surely get it. It is made up of the kind of people that like Curry best.

Where This Vote Is To Be Found Whatever there was of the controllable, "push" vote in San Francisco a year ago was cast for P. H. McCarthy for mayor. He received 29,437 votes. Of this there was a normal Union Labor party vote of about 21,500, so that the controllable vote in San Francisco must be within the 8,000 difference between the average vote of other Union Labor candidates and the vote for McCarthy, but this 8,000 votes also included the "higher-ups" who voted for McCarthy because they wanted to and not because they were controlled. Therefore, it is unreasonable to suppose that San Francisco has more than 5,000 voters whom the macquereau and the barkeeper can deliver to the highest bidder. It is improbable that all the rest of the state has more than as many more, although wherever there is a saloon or a house of ill fame a center of such infection will be found. Let alone, this vote will practically all go to Curry. If desired for Anderson or Stanton it will have to be swung at considerable cost. The Watchman doubts any attempt to swing it, for the reason that it will not hold the balance of power even if cast all for one man, and the Political Bureau is not going to throw money away just to make business lively "down the line." Unless something happens to take Curry, Anderson or Stanton out of the running (and it is getting too late for any such event to happen) Hiram W. Johnson will get more votes than any two of the other candidates. The back country is two to one for Johnson and a divided urban vote cannot overcome it. It need surprise no one if Johnson comes in with a clear majority over all. Curry will get the slum vote. The Big Boss might like to swing it to Anderson, but it will cost a lot of money and the game won't be worth the candle.

If Anderson Is Nominated It is probable that the minds of voters are made up and that nothing that may be said at this late date will make many changes, and yet it may be well to forecast very briefly the effects likely to flow from the results of next Tuesday's expression of party opinion. If Alden Anderson is nominated there is a fighting chance for him to be elected. If elected he will give the state about the same sort of government that it has been having under Gillett. The great corporations will get about what they want and they will be made to put up with as little as possible that they do not want, but, where their interests are not involved, the government of the state will be decent, more economical than with Gillett and somewhat more cautious. Mr. Anderson is not as spectacular as Gillett, is more level headed and has a finer sense of the proprieties. Parker, Hatton, Burke, and the rest of the Southern Pacific hired men, will be consulted, but they will not be so brazenly in evidence. Mr. Anderson is not a man to go back on the men who made him governor, nor is he a man who will relish the fact that every time he reaches for his pocket handkerchief his parting coat-tails will disclose the S. P. brand upon the seat of his trousers. Therefore he will sit tight and say little. After such men as Budd, Gage and Gillett, California can stand Anderson if it has to, but it ought not to have to. It ought to be free and probably will be, but not with Anderson in the gubernatorial chair.

If Charley Curry Shall Be Nominated If Charles F. Curry should be nominated party lines will be obliterated in November. It would not be possible to find one with a microscope. All the better element of the Republican party will vote for Bell and all the worse element in the Democratic party will be for Curry. If elected, and he may be, Mr. Curry will be able to do business with the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company on terms satisfactory to himself. One of the conditions will be that every office to be filled by appointment shall be filled by a man who is, first of all, a Curry man and afterward a dutiful servant of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. He will build up the most perfect executive political machine California has ever seen. The imbecility of allowing the "organization" vote to be divided between three candidates for nomination will not be repeated. But the taxes! Wherever a place can be made for a Curry pensioner on the bounty of the state it will be. Spoils of office is Mr. Curry's stock in trade. He is no boddler. He is too smart for that. He is no fool. No man in the state understands the state's business better than he. If he stays on the "water wagon" he will have few advisers and will need none. He will remember John D. Spreckels in the days of his prosperity, but not to do anything that will hurt Curry's political future. He will be the master of his own destiny, but there would be more politics to the square inch of his administration, ten to one, than to any other in the history of the state. That he should be nominated and elected is unthinkable and yet, without a doubt, he will be second in the race for nomination.

If Stanton Is Nominated Philip A. Stanton is a big, undeveloped, harum-scarum boy. Nobody, not even Stanton himself, can foretell what he will do if he should be nominated and elected governor of California. He is more eccentric than independent, has obliged the Southern Pacific's political bureau on occasion and worked with it, but his principles, so far as they control his actions, are disinclined toward corporation domination. A contest between Stanton and Bell would be full of interest, but as Stanton is sure to be the third or the fourth man in the running for nomination we need concern ourselves little about what he might or might not do if nominated and elected.

Vote Down To The Bottom It was ordained in the Book of Fate that the surnames of the reform candidates for nomination on the Republican ticket should begin farther down in the alphabet than the names on the "organization" list. Voters need, therefore, to scan their tickets well before doing any stamping. The best way is to take a Lincoln-Roosevelt ticket into the booth and vote carefully therefrom. All the names of the League candidates will be on the ticket, but, in most cases, nearer the bottom than the top. A close contest might easily be determined one way or other by a little carelessness on the part of the voter in quitting voting before reaching the bottom of his ticket.

A Last Word For Johnson The Watchman is of opinion that Hiram W. Johnson will be both nominated and elected and that with that consummation California will enter upon a new era in its political history. Having a taste of liberty the state will ever after wish to preserve it. That experience will show not only that the people of California can govern themselves, but that they will do it with justice to all interests. Not all the reforms that ever will be wanted will be inaugurated at the first session of the legislature, but only some of them. It will take two years of executive experience, and of reform legislative purpose, to work out solutions of vexatious problems, but from the second legislative session very much remedial legislation may be hoped for. Two years will also be needed for informing and ascertaining the public mind in relation to state policies. Of one thing we may be certain: No cinch measures will get by Governor Johnson if he can stop them. He will give every interest a square deal. He has a keen mind, a sound judgment and a clear conscience and these will not fail him as governor. As sure as they do not he will not fail the people who shall have nominated and elected him. He went into this contest reluctantly and for a cause, not an office. He will use that office for his cause—the making of California into a free state—and not for personal or political advantage. The splendid campaign he has made is a fore-runner of an administration equally splendid.

Just a Word For Alfred Bourne Nye Here is a man with whom conscientiousness is a ruling passion. He cannot take the wrong side of any issue even for the sake of argument. He is sincerity itself. With him public service is more than a public trust. It is a consecration. It absorbs the whole man. He is the honestest man The Watchman ever knew. He never devoted to private use so much as a postage stamp that the state paid for, and he is as firm, as courageous, as resolute, as he is square. His intellect is clear and strong and his judgment as nearly unerring as it is given to the mind of man to be. By what fortuitous train of circumstances he failed of entering upon a career that led to the supreme bench The Watchman does not know, but the hand of destiny worked ill for justice when it switched him to another track. No man in the state would make a better chief justice or a better governor than Nye, but it has been ordained that he should be the Watchdog of the Treasury of his native state, California. The Democrats think so highly of him that they propose putting up no candidate against him and will also make him their nominee, but he is a Republican. All his life he has been a Republican. Unless the Republicans of California nominate him he will not run for election. Failure on the part of the Republicans to nominate him will be accepted by the public as conclusive that the majority of Republicans in this state have no use for a man whom the allied villainies cannot use. That is the issue as to State Controller. Take especial pains to vote for A. B. Nye.

What About C. C. Young? Just this: During the last session of the legislature C. C. Young made an absolutely perfect record, whether judged by moral, intellectual or political values. Such a record is to the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau what a red flag is when waved in the eyes of a raging bull. It makes that Bureau wild. That Bureau wants any sort of man except that. Though heaven and earth be moved to accomplish it, such a man must be beaten for re-election or all is lost. It is not, therefore, that the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau has any hold upon Redmond C. Staats. It is probable that it does not care about Staats one way or another. The purpose is to beat Young, and that Staats has lent himself to such a purpose makes it evident that he is not as discerning as he should be or else he is not as high type of man as his friends have confidently supposed. He has no business in that race and voters in the fifty-second assembly district should make it their business to make this truth so plain to him that he will not forget it to his latest day.

Kent's Fences Are All Right A careful investigation has been made into the charge of the McKinlay partisans that William Kent was responsible for illegally fencing government lands in Nevada, that he is a law-breaker and liable to criminal prosecution therefor. The facts are these: In the 80's, before William Kent became president of the Golconda Cattle Company, and before the government had surveyed its lands, a "drift" fence was built for about three miles, partly on company and partly on government land, to prevent cattle straying beyond the range; it encloses nothing and is of use to more than ten other cattle raisers besides the Golconda company; has never been objected to by the government's agents and is understood to be permissible. Besides this, there is a fence surrounding 800 acres of dry, non-grazing waste land, one-third belonging to the Golconda company and two-thirds to the government, used for rodeoing three times a year and by all the stockmen on that range for three to ten days in all, then thrown entirely open. It has never been understood to be objectionable to the government, but as being a legitimate privilege going with the pasturage of government lands under governmental control. If it had been objected to it would long since have been removed. It was built more than twenty years ago and before Mr. Kent became the head of the Golconda company. Since becoming its head, Mr. Kent has repeatedly charged the local management to be careful not to transgress the law in any respect, but, in case of doubt, to give the government the benefit of the doubt. These facts are certified to by the Sheriff of Humboldt county and by other stockmen for many years conversant with the facts. If "Kent's Fences"

do not prove a boomerang to knock McKinlay's fences all down in the second congressional district of California it will be because a pack of lies well stuck to will do their work, or because the love for American fair play has gone out of the hearts of the men of that district and, had not Mr. Kent been an insurgent Republican, the Ballingerites would never have given those fences a second thought.

Why Allison Ware Should Get There It has been the misfortune rather than the fault of Mr. Allison Ware that he has made some of the pedagogical dry bones of this state to rattle. They are afraid of him as of a man who might undertake to do things if he had a chance. Probably he will. He is young, he is full of enthusiasm, he is virile, he has confidence in himself and he is not oppressed with the profundity of the wisdom of the conventional in education. If nominated and elected Superintendent of Public Instruction for California he will be very likely to be something of a mustard plaster on the educational body politic. It needs it. A good sized blister won't hurt. The Republican voters should give him a boost. Allison Ware ought to get there.

Anything To Beat Leavitt One of the most forceful and capable legislators California has produced and, if he were only right minded, as capable material for governor as may easily be found, nevertheless Frank W. Leavitt, Republican candidate for the state senate in the sixteenth district, should not only not be nominated but should be beaten if nominated, and for the reason that he is not the right kind of man. He stands for Wrong Things instead of for Right Things. His record proves this. Beat Frank Leavitt.

Macarthur the Man, Troy the Democrat Ten excellent gentlemen have permitted their names to be appended to a letter for circulation in the Fourth congressional district favoring the nomination of Robert P. Troy in the place of that of Walter Macarthur and chiefly on the ground that Troy, being once a Democrat, will be always a Democrat and never anything but a Democrat. To use Mr. Troy's own language, "If elected to congress I shall stand squarely upon the Democratic platform, shall support Democratic principles, Democratic measures in congress and will act with the Democratic party and no other." Alas for Troy! Born untimely into this world! Had he been born early enough to vote for Jackson at all he would still be voting for him. "Never scratched no ticket!" Never was man more out of kilter with his time. Troy needs condition powders for hidebind. Walter Macarthur, too, is a Democrat, as good, as clean, as sincere a Democrat as Troy, but, confronted with the alternative of going wrong with his party or right with some other, Walter Macarthur will go right. That is the twentieth century spirit. The Troy spirit is nearly as ancient as ancient Troy and unless the Democrats of the Fourth district are groping in mediaeval darkness they will nominate Macarthur the Man in preference to Troy the Democrat.

A Legislative Ticket For Primary Voters The Watchman has sought for information from all available sources regarding the relative fitness of the various candidates for Republican nomination to the legislature. The following paragraphs are offered as a guide to those voters who want free men in the next legislature, men who will hold up Hiram Johnson's hands in his work of reform. The Watchman's choice is indicated by names printed in black letter. Where The Watchman could find out nothing satisfactory upon which to base an estimate, the phrase "no data" is used. In districts where there is only one candidate for Republican nomination, that fact is noted, usually without comment.

Senatorial Candidates Second: E. C. Bonner of Alameda, a free man, much preferable to Arthur M. Dean, of Redding, who is straight out "organization." It is Modoc's turn, too.

Fourth: John H. Graves, of Willows, has no opposition.

Sixth: A. E. Boynton, of Oroville, has no opposition, either Republican or Democratic, as he should not; one of the best men at the last session.

Eighth: W. B. Whitney of Sonoma is preferred to Walter F. Price, machine man.

Tenth: Clarke Howard, of Placerville, has no opposition.

Twelfth: L. L. Dennett has no opposition and should be actively supported in November against J. B. Curtin, incumbent and Democrat.

Fourteenth: John R. Wilson, of Alameda, a clean and able young man, should be nominated as against Frank W. Otis, incumbent and political jellyfish, and as against George J. Hans, of Alameda, who has the machine support.

Sixteenth: Edward J. Tyrrell, of Oakland, is highly recommended and should certainly be nominated as against Frank W. Leavitt, incumbent, of Oakland, one of the cleverest and most offensively machine senators.

Eighteenth: Daniel P. Regan should be nominated over Tom Finn's choice, D. J. Toomey.

Twentieth: John W. Sweeney should beat Edward F. Bryant, James B. Newsom and William H. Schooler, all undesirable.

Twenty-second: E. J. Callan, whose record in the assembly last session was perfect, should be nominated over Edwin T. McMurray and John J. Cassidy.

Twenty-fourth: Marc Anthony, incumbent, with a fair record, is a better choice than D. J. Beban, George H. Perine, James W. Boyce or Gus Hartman, all highly objectionable.

Twenty-sixth: A. M. Drew has no opposition.

Twenty-eighth: Marshall Black, incumbent, of Palo Alto, made an excellent record and should defeat James W. Rea, of Santa Clara, former machine boss and present recipient of machine support.

Thirtieth: J. L. Avey, of Redlands, should beat A. C. Denman, Jr., of Redlands, the machine candidate.

Thirty-second: E. O. Larkins, of Visalia, an exceptionally capable man, should receive the nomination against Jesse R. Dorsey, of Bakersfield, who is weak and supported by the machine.

Thirty-fourth: Lee C. Gates, of Los Angeles, a reformer with a fine record, should defeat W. A. Savage, incumbent, of Los Angeles, "machine" and of indefensible public record.

Thirty-sixth: Charles W. Bell, of Pasadena, is unopposed, very properly.

Thirty-eighth: Leslie R. Hewitt, one of the strong men of Los Angeles, should be nominated over H. S. G. McCartney, incumbent, "machine" and not dependable, and George L. Sanders, both of Los Angeles.

Fortieth: William A. Sloane, of San Diego, should beat Leroy A. Wright, incumbent, of San Diego, both because of Sloane's high character and Wright's very questionable actions in the last legislature relative to the direct primary law and railroad regulation.

Assembly Districts. First: no data. Second: William Kehoe, incumbent, of Eureka, has earned his unopposed nomination.

Third: No data.

Fourth: No data.

Fifth: George S. Redstreak, of Johnsville, unopposed and deserves it.

Sixth: W. D. L. Held, of Ukiah, is unopposed.

Seventh: No data.

Eighth: A. H. Hewitt, incumbent, of Yuba City, one of the best and ablest men in the last session, is unopposed.

Ninth: Frank M. Rutherford, of Truckee, unopposed.

Of the seven supreme court justices six come from north of Mount Hamilton in Santa Clara county. Alameda county has two. All Southern and South Central California together have but one.

THE SQUARE DEAL

Requires that one of these places go to Southern California. It is unthinkable that Republicans will, in voting, fail of recognizing the justice of this claim.

CURTIS D. WILBUR is the only Republican candidate from Southern California. He is able. He is honest. He is FREE.

ALL LOVERS OF FAIR PLAY

Will vote for Wilbur to fill one of these places. That should include EVERYBODY. This narrows the choice to Sloss or Melvin. Which?

Justice M. C. Sloss is a jurist of recognized standing. He came to his place on the bench without taint of political manipulation. He should be nominated and elected.

Justice Harry A. Melvin was appointed to his place by an "organization" governor, was nominated by an "organization" convention and ran 50,000 behind his ticket because the people believed him to be a political judge. He is being supported by the one litigant that has cases in all courts.

JUSTICE M. C. SLOSS

LEAVE MELVIN AT HOME

Fifteenth: W. B. Griffiths, of Monticello, is unopposed.

Sixteenth: Geo. W. Pierce, of Winton, is unopposed.

Eighteenth: S. Luke Howe, of Sacramento, is preferred to John C. March, of Sacramento.

Nineteenth: No data.

Twentieth: John R. Cronin, incumbent, is unopposed.

San Francisco Assemblymen Twenty-eighth: John P. Durken should defeat Finn's choice, Andrew Cunningham.

Twenty-ninth: C. J. Walsh is better than J. P. Tighe, who has no chance, or Daniel Rimplinger, saloonkeeper and Finn's choice.

Thirty-first: Possibly W. A. McDonald as against George R. Burke and Joseph Sweetman, the latter a Finn man and ex-pugilist.

J. Winter, a Lynch and Finn man, and over Frederick C. Pattison, who has no chance.

Thirty-sixth: Henry N. Beatty, incumbent, better than James W. Bonney, Finn and McCarthy man and than George A. Wentworth, former assemblyman with a bad record.

Thirty-seventh: E. J. Baumberger, better than John J. McManus, follower of McCarthy and Finn.

Thirty-eighth: Possibly M. C. Randolph as against a collection of undesirables named Gus G. Brown, Edward Barron, Mark Sena, Isaac Leipsic, E. D. J. Nolan, John Halpin and H. J. Dunn.

Thirty-ninth: J. E. White, fine, able man, should defeat Julius Frankel, supported by McCarthy in return for political debts.

Fortieth: Possibly Henry Thompson, whose opponent, Milton L. Schmitt, is backed by Fleishacker, Lynch and Finn.

Forty-first: Abraham Perry Harris should beat Nat. C. Coghlan, offensive machine incumbent.

Forty-second: Arthur Joell should defeat F. V. Kingston, former protege of George D. Collins.

Forty-third: M. L. Stern should beat Frank N. Rodgers, Finn man, and Howard Sharron, lightweight.

Forty-fourth: Henry Stern is preferable to an undesirable assortment named Melville Hermann, Victor A. Sbragia, S. P. Blumenberg, Daniel Giovannini, Walter J. Bryant (another Finn deputy) and William E. Poole.

Forty-eighth: No data.

Forty-ninth: No data.

Fiftieth: William C. Clark, of Oakland, a sterling man, should defeat Harry W. Pulcifer, incumbent, of Oakland, a man elected on a Lincoln-Roosevelt platform who voted at all critical times with the machine.

Fifty-first: James H. Pond is preferred to James M. Smith.

Fifty-second: C. C. Young, incumbent, of Berkeley, made a brilliantly good record and should be nominated over Redmond C. Staats, of Berkeley, whose professions of reform affiliations should have persuaded him to leave the field open to Young.

Fifty-third: No data.

Fifty-fourth: No Republican candidate, but Maher, unopposed incumbent Democrat, made a good record.

He made a good record as county auditor, 1903-06, and stands well in the community. He is the only Republican against John W. A REPUBLIC THAT WAS

A THOUSAND-YEAR EXPERIMENT IN POPULAR GOVERNMENT

By ARTHUR J. PILLSBURY

With the decadence of the Roman empire the barbarians of the north began to press upon the Valley of the Po and, in A. D. 452, Attila, the Hun, overran the region drained into the Adriatic, butchered the men, violated the women and sacked the cities. Those who sought safety in flight had nowhere to go save out into the marshes of the upper Adriatic where certain mudflats had scantily lifted their heads above the ebb and flow of the tides. There were perhaps 200 in all of these mudflats, only twelve being of any considerable size. When the tide was out the interval between them and the shore was an oozy marsh impossible for an army to march over. When the tide was in the water was still too shallow to be navigated by anything except vessels of the lightest draft, in the handling of which the barbarians had no skill. As for the open ways out to sea they were too labyrinthine to be navigated by deep-sea craft without the services of pilots to the manner born, and none was so craven as to pilot a hostile fleet through the channel to his home city.

The Founding of Venice

On these lowly and lone mudflats there gathered some thousands of refugees from the adjacent littoral to begin life anew, all poor, all equal, all free. At first there was such an organization of social order on each of the islands as necessity compelled, but, friction developing among the several communities, a broader form of government became needful and, in 466, was held the first assemblage of the people for the formation of an orderly government. The government then formed was much afflicted with dissensions and hatreds, and yet somehow was bound together by a common peril. On one thing they were all resolved. They would allow no one not of their own choosing to rule over them. Such was the origin of the Venetian Republic.

The first concern of the Venetians was to turn the mudflats into vegetable gardens, their next to find the best fishing grounds. To these elements of life-sustaining industry they added salt-making on the marshes and, having remembered some of the handicrafts practiced on the mainland, they soon began to produce articles of commerce which, with the salt and the cured fishes, they were able to make the nucleus of a coasting trade prosecuted in ever-widening spheres of activity until, covering in a sentence what required generations to consummate, Venice became the most important commercial city of Europe. It had as many as four thousand merchantmen sailing all known seas, and became the distributing point for the riches of the Far East. It was rich, opulent and proud.

With the growth of trade and accumulation of riches aristocratic tendencies and pride of family crept into what had been as free and equal a democracy as ever our own New England enjoyed. "Captains of commerce," as we should call them because of their great services to the new state, began to ask for, and were good humoredly given, special exemptions and immunities in the form of lower tariffs on what they wished to bring in and higher bounties on what they wished to export, all of which helped to make them still stronger, richer, more aristocratic and increasingly influential in the political affairs of the young commonwealth.

Another centralizing tendency was the need for a strong government to carry on the many wars waged for commercial supremacy with other maritime cities. The merchant princes mainly financed these wars, and were their chief beneficiaries, while the common people manned the fighting ships and spilt their blood.

All this time Venice continued to love liberty and to cherish the ideal of a republic, but more and more the liberty they loved came to be the liberty of Venice, not that of the Venetian citizens. The dukes, or "doges" they elected, came to be confined to a few families, and they usually associated their sons with them in administering public affairs, so that, in many cases, the office became hereditary by election if not by law.

Then, too, as Venice increased in wealth and power, it became possessed of a passion for pleasure and for beautifying the city. Ostentatious munificence and vulgar display were in a measure atoned for by charity as ostentatious and as munificent. One in every twelve citizens became a pauper, but discontent was lost in gaiety, in great pageants and fiestas that brought the pleasure-seekers of Europe to Venetian palaces to spend their money and live the Venetian life. All this tended to a relinquishment on the part of the common citizen of some portion of his rights as a citizen and to cause him more and more to defer to the wishes of the few great ones who made Venetian pleasures possible and profitable to those who contributed to them. It turned much money loose in the channels of trade, furnished wages for the workers, easy money for adventurers and alms for beggars.

But democracy did not yield to aristocracy, or aristocracy to oligarchy, without a struggle. There were not lacking men who perceived the trend that tendencies were manifesting, men who had courage enough to sound the alarm. They were branded as demagogues and agitators and were speedily warned against fomenting discontent among the people. If they were persistent they were waited upon at night and escorted beyond the boundaries of the republic and warned not to return on pain of death. If they ventured back to renew their injurious agitation for a restoration of the rights of the people bands of bravos took them from their homes at night, chains were fastened to their ankles, they were rowed down stream and thrown overboard in deep water, there to stand bowing and nodding with the ebbing and flowing tides until, falling away piecemeal, their bones found sepulture in the abundant ooze washed in by the rivers.

Yet the government of Venice was not on the whole harsh. Those who forebore to resist it were treated with consideration. Society resolved itself into upper, middle and lower classes. The upper class tended to become more restricted and more powerful, the middle class to become less and less numerous and to fade into the lower, while the lower class became relatively as numerous as the sands on the beach. Litigation between middle class men was promptly and justly adjudicated. Between members of the lower class justice was meted out with as much promptness if with less justice. It was only when issue was joined between members of the upper class and those of the lower that justice grew tardy and its determination unsatisfactory.

Loss of Liberty Gradual

The transformation from a free government in which all participated into a free city in the government of which few participated was gradual. History was not rapidly made. There were occasional convocations of the people long after the people ceased to exert any real power in the affairs of government. These convocations were all "programmed." The people were permitted freely to elect their doge—after the doge had ceased to possess really independent power and that power had come to reside in a secret committee of ten or, as in later years, in a committee of three chosen by the plutocratic oligarchy, which oligarchy, however, knew its own members too well to trust one of its own number to succeed himself in office or to enjoy a term of more than one year.

Considered as a government, apart from its having been a travesty on the term "republic," the government of Venice was not, judged by the standards of its time, a bad government. For many hundred years it was the most efficient government in Europe. It was in the hands of the strongest men Venice produced. Venice enjoyed what we are ever striving for, and seldom obtaining, a business man's administration of public affairs. Nothing was left to chance. An intricate system of checks and balances, of auditing and expediting, kept the government fairly honest.

If liberty and equality count for nothing, if the dream that humanity is one day to enter into possession of human rights unalienably be iridescent, then the plutocratic oligarchy that governed Venice behind the mask of a free republic may have been a model for all time, but it progressed from equality to inequality, from manhood suffrage to a patrician electorate, numbering less than two per cent of the population. Even this restricted electorate, finally numbering no more than 800 for the entire republic, had less and less of participation in government until, finally, the Great Council, the parliament of the Republic, became self-elective, self-perpetuating and limited to men of the first rank in wealth and station. All loved Venice and were loyal to it, but their concern for the common people was limited to the ability of the common people to contribute to the safety, the glory, the pleasure of the governing class.

Venice Under the Oligarchy

The effect of this regime on Venetian life is full of interest. Art flourished and literature was patronized if it was not created. Etiquette became a passion and licentiousness so nearly universal as almost to have destroyed the institution of marriage. Having been blessed with a male heir, and his legitimacy having been established so that he could inherit title and fortune, no further attention was paid to domestic proprieties and there were few families among the rich that did not notoriously contain spurious offspring.

Of all countries of Europe, Venice alone was so apart from royalty, inherited aristocracy and domination by some suzerain as to afford an opportunity for the free working out of inherent evolutionary tendencies. It began with all men free and equal; equal, not only before the law, but in that universality of poverty which forced all to live by labor or die of starvation. In the course of a few generations equality of condition had been lost never to be regained, equality before the law followed and, finally, the very spirit of equality was stamped out of the hearts and minds of the people. If it dared to show its head it was set upon by all the powers of government as government fought the plague and as Morosini fought the Turks.

The Venetian system of sanitation was the best that Europe knew, but if the Venetian oligarchy was concerned for the health of Venetian artisans it was that the product of their handiwork might furnish the foundation for Venetian trade. Nothing that could "hurt business" was permitted, nothing that could "foster infant industries" was overlooked, but the business that was not hurt yielded increase only to the opulent, and the industry that was established through governmental protection kept the artisans only a little above the poverty line, while the owners grew greater and richer year by year and generation by generation.

The manufacturing artisans formed guilds (trade unions). Instead of fighting them the government of Venice took them under its protection, taxed them lightly, gave them certain special privileges and made their product the foundation of the commerce of the city, but by their restrictions as to apprenticeship the ranks of unskilled and hand-to-mouth labor were greatly augmented and pauperism became a more serious problem almost than the wars with Genoa or the Turks.

The importance of the history of the Venetian Republic does not consist in the bigness of the stage upon which the drama was enacted. While the commerce of Venice extended to all known ports, and its navies sailed all known seas, yet the dominion of its government never reached far. Venice founded colonies and defended them with zeal, but its territorial expansion did not extend far beyond the adjacent mainland, and Venice itself, the real heart of the republic, never had during the life of the Republic exceeded 200,000 inhabitants. Its history is important and enlightening because alone of all countries of Europe, unless Switzerland be excepted, it had its birth in freedom and was afforded an opportunity to work out its destiny little hindered by the overmastering influence of an hereditary royalty or by the domination of the church. Therefore, it gives us an opportunity to see into what human society, left to itself to develop along evolutionary tendencies, may be expected to evolve where the accumulation of wealth is the overmastering purpose and commercial prosperity the only goal.

That consummation was the poverty of the many, great riches for the few, and the differentiation of society into an upper and a lower class. The upper class were not all rich, but all those who were not rich were pensioners upon those who were, or upon the government, and upon no account could they be expected to so degrade themselves as to earn their livings in the sweat of their faces. They were idle, dissolute and unambitious. The many were below social recognition, most of them very poor and altogether hopeless. The rich few were likewise dissolute, but cultivated, merciless only when their authority was resisted. They were commercially daring, cunning and successful. Venice, having killed off the bravest and best of its middle class in futile wars with neighboring cities, resorted to hired mercenaries, but gold was powerless to take the place of manhood and, long before its downfall, Venice became politically insignificant while still commercially important.

The doubling of the Cape of Good Hope, a few years before America was discovered, was a serious blow to the commercial supremacy of Venice, but supremacy was not indispensable to Venetian prosperity, and it continued to be commercially and industrially important. Had the liberties of the people been preserved, and equality of opportunity been protected, even the legions of Napoleon might have found Venice less helpless when confronted by them. But patriotism had gone out of the hearts of the people. They could not be made to believe that the conqueror had anything worse in store for them than they were suffering under the plutocratic oligarchy that had dominated their government and social order for centuries. Threatened with revolution from within and subjugation from without, the Venetian grandees, considering their own interests, opened the gates to Napoleon and he wrote the word "Finis" to the Venetian Republic.

A Republic Only in Name

A nation may do a worse thing than to die. It may live, as the Venetian Republic lived, a travesty on the name Republic, the absolute negation of liberty and equality, for more than a thousand years. If we date the birth of the Republic from the first assemblage of the people of all the islands for a union in the common defense, A. D. 466, then the years that elapsed before the word "Finis" was written, were 1331, but if we take for our starting point the date of the election of the first doge, A. D. 697, then the Republic of Venice endured for 1100 years.

At precisely what date the liberties of the people were definitely lost and a plutocratic oligarchy had made itself supreme cannot be stated with certainty. The relinquishment of the power of the many into the hands of the few was progressive and insidious. But this we do know: with the establishment of the Committee of Ten in 1310 the last vestige of a pretense of free government had gone, but that the soul of it had been snuffed out two centuries earlier is fairly probable. If so, then the Republic of Venice was a republic for less than 400 years out of a duration of 1100, and for 700 years it was a mockery of a republic, a tyranny, an oppressor of mankind.

During this 700 year period the names that figure in Venetian history are few and always confined to a few first families. It was as if our government should persist to be in the hands of the Morgans and Rockefellers, Astors and Vanderbilts, Harrimans and Herrins, Carnegies and Hills, century after century, the same names continuously recurring and few new ones coming to the fore. The Venetian government was a government of houses, and these houses, being more ambitious commercially than politically, at once stood together against the commonality and against the predominance of any one of their own number. The "system" which they evolved was so perfect that no power less great than that of Napoleon the great could or did overthrow it.

If the reader shall find in this hastily sketched, and wholly inadequate, review of the history of "A Republic That Was," some analogies to movements that are taking place in our own republic in our own time his discovery must be accounted for on the ground that truth compelled it. It has been held to hopefully, and generally believed, that a free society, unhampered by the element of royalty-in-the-blood, could never resolve itself into an aristocracy and a proletariat, but the history of the Venetian Republic belies that hope and negatives that doctrine. It makes it evident that such a society, making wealth its aim and prosperity its purpose, excluding the moralities and the aspirations for liberty and equality, will become, first, an aristocracy

SKID, you spoke of Ole Oleson as an Irishman who had eleven children and seven dogs. Isn't that a peculiar name for a Celtic gentleman?"

Not half so peculiar as Ole an' his family. Ole is a stray inhabitant blowed in 'bout ten year ago an' lives mighty clost to himse'f. He has lots o' fren's an' pop says he guessed Ole married a norphan asylum an' changed his name for luck.

He lives back in the bresh off the San'hill road 'bout ten mile to'ards civilization es pop calls it. Ole has seven diff'rent kin's o' dogs, mos'ly houn's an', like the children, hungry efter eatin' all they can. The kids is jus' es diff'rent es the dogs. Three is plain, freckled Pats; two is redheaded 'ith black eyes; two is Dutch lookin', some o' the res' is dark complected 'ith blue eyes an' the baby is a little nigger. Pop says he aint got the fax, but its mighty probable Ole eloped 'ith a norphan asylum.

The las' time I saw 'em all together was at the great San'hill race 'tween Jelly Puffer an' pop. That was the mos' excitin' time we ever had in this part o' the swamp. Pop despised Jelly, who was allus stuck up. He was pop's secon' half cousin er soth'in, an' was allus runnin' fer office but never got higher 'n school d'rector an' delicate to the state convention.

Jelly is about five four one way an' four five th' ether, an' w'en he's settin' down, w'ich is his usual way, you can't tell w'ich way the figgers fit. He has curly yellow hair, red cheeks an' cross eyes an' is allus smilin. W'en pop would be recitin' at the literary Jelly 'd set in the back seats where it was darkest, 'ith a lot of galoots around 'im sayin' funny things under 'is breath. He was pizon to pop.

Ev'ry fall efter seedin', people 'roun' here 'd go down to the White County Fair. W'en comin' home they'd git to racin', specially w'en chucked up 'ith Monticello fire water. I've seen diff'rent parts o' wagons an' stray mules fer twenty miles 'long the Tippecanoe river road many a time. I have seen es high es three diff'rent famblies crowded in one remainin' wagon 'ith the men ridin' double behin' on horses an' mules, mebbly half of all of 'em had ther heads wrapped up.

"Ever any serious accidents, Skid?"

Once 'n aw'ile. I guess "Jupy" Johnson is on'y the ninth man es was kilt in the las' ten years. Mos' o' the racin' is on mules er horse-back now. The men have got so w'en a nani-mal falls, a man jus' spreads 'is arms an' laigs an' kind o' lights sof' like a flyin' squirrel.

'Bout two er three years 'fore the great race pop went over to Winamac, a heathen country east o' here, an' bought a three-quarter Morgan es looked like a deer. Nen fer six months he tore up the San'hill road atrainin' 'er. I ast pop about 'er pedigree.

"Skid," he said to me, "her pedigree is more'n a mile long. It's jus' fearful." Nen I ast him 'bout her sire.

"Son," said pop swellin' up, "he has run a mile in one-thirty flat 'thout pantin'. So they tell me." Nex' I ast about 'er mother.

"She on'y run onct, Skid, an' she was that fast she run plumb clean right out from under the saddle an' left the rider 'bout forty rod behin' sittin' there an' wonderin'. She was too fas', Skid, nentirely too golding, dadrap-pin fas', so they tell me."

"That's purty fas', pop," I said, solem. Pop come up clost an' whispered in my ear, "Skid, don't breathe it to a livin' mortal soul, I'm layin' fer Jelly." The way pop said them las' words made me shiver.

The purse was nine dollars an' twenty-five cents apiece. Pop borried one an' a quarter from mom's chicken money besides. Where Jelly got his'n is a perfec' myst'ry to this day. The jedges fixed a hay wire 'crost the San'hill road 'tween two jack oaks down by Jake Spadings, where he scours 'is plow an' works out 'is road tax evry year. Nen they stepped off a mile to the north.

They put that $18.50 in a red tobacer poke above the road on the wire and o' course the feller that got there first 'd reach up an' grab the money. An' the race you want to remember was 'tween pop on that deer like Morgie an' Jelly on his zebra. I have tol' you 'bout it. I have never seen so many people before er sence linin' the last end o' the mile.

'Bout three o'clock on Sunday Jelly come tippy tappin' in on his long eared, flat sided zebra, smilin' an' sloppin' roun' but settin' them stripes purty square in the middle. Pop 'ithout any hat on an' in his barefeet was settin' graceful on Morgie, w'ich was pawin' the earth an' shone like a crow. They never noticed each ether more'n ef th' ether feller wasn't on earth. An' what was curious to me, pop had a thick hick'ry in his right han'.

Somebody started 'em a mile back. I have never seen a race like that. Ef you looked at Morgie an' pop 'ith his long black hair an' wiskers flyin' back over his shoulders, an' him leanin' low on Morgie, like a goat sucker on a rail, you'd think o' double geared lightnin'. Ef you looked at Jelly, kind o' bumpin' an' sloppin' roun' on that long, lopin' zebra you'd think of a girl ridin' on a gallop a hazel nut huntin'.

For a fac' though they was comin' like a whirlwin' with the dust risin' up like a hurricane fer forty rods behin'. The people was dancin' an' screamin' an' yellin' jus' mad with excitement. Right w'ile they was comin' the fastes', the zebra w'ich was just clippin' lazy 'long the side o' Morgie, kind o' nippin' 'er an' layin' its ears back, suddenly took a fat chaw out o' pop's laig. 'Thout lookin' pop brought the hick'ry down like a bull whip on the zebra. I guess he wanted to hit Jelly more'n he did the zebra. But it was fat'!

The zebra mad, er scart to death, lit out. It soared with Jelly like a prairie chicken. It beat pop out a hundred yards. Pop on Morgie came in like a streak o' tobacco spit in the sunshine. Morgie run on into Jake's plowed groun', her laigs got tangled an' she fell. Pop hed made no preparations fer stoppin' sudden an' he jus' kep goin' on. He knocked a panel o' fence out o' Jake's yard, rolled like a hoop forty foot, stoppin' on Jake's hog killin' platform, with his feet bringin' up an' slammin' down in the hog scaldin' barrel at the en'. And there he lay onsensible.

Nen I heard screamin' an' yellin' and everybody shoutin' "Take keer yo'sefs; take keer yo'sefs; runaway, runaway!" and everybody shootin' into the bresh like rabbits. Lookin' up the road 'ith a fearful rattlety bang, bang, swellin' out of the horse race dust, here come Ole with his whole gang o' dogs and children. The mules was swingin' ther heads low from side-to-side, the seven kin's o' dogs was barkin' cheerful 'round 'em, all runnin' off. An lordamighty, w'at was Ole doin'? Ole was lambastin' them mules with a long gad evry jump. I guess the mules thought mebbly Ole was runnin' off 'stead o' them.

Ole with his wife, she was 'bout es big es a haycock dressed up, set on the front seat, 'er eyes es big es saucers an' screamin' like a Nindian. Ole was settin' back holdin' the lines, his little red wiskers tilted up in the air perfec'ly happy at the gait he was cuttin' 'long that San'hill road. The childern was cryin' an' screamin' an' holdin' on behin'. An' such screamin' an' rattlety bangin' I never heard worse.

W'en Ole got closter I could see him leanin' back, shettin' his eyes an' wavin' 'is head from side to side feelin' heavenly.

The hin' wheel hit a root an' I saw three o' the smaller kids shoot out in the bushes like young quail. Nex' the front wheel went down in a chuckhole an' four ether children sailed out in the pawpaw bresh like flyin' squirrels. Nen the wagon run out a ninch er two an' a hub hit a noak saplin', the hin' en' sloughed 'roun' with a fearful roar an' the res' of the kids went soarin' somewher's. Missis Oleson clung to that high spring seat like death. She looked like a goggled napper-pition froze stiff.

W'en the puffin' mules, swingin' ther heads side-to-side, es if runnin' off was ther reglar business, an' them happy dogs, barkin' like they'd treed a coon, struck the plowed groun' the wagon reach broke, the back en' dropped an' poor Misses Oleson went whirlin' over an' over back'ard like them showmen an' lit head down in the top of a big patch of elderberry bushes, 'er body settlin' graceful down till on'y about four inches o' her shoes an' red stockin's showed, jus' like them smallpox signs the doctors tack up.

Ole hung on to the lines an' was drug fer a hundred foot in the sand an' dirt 'fore he had sence 'nough to leggo. Then the mules runnin' light, kep' on the rest o' the afternoon. D'reckly he rose up slow, waved slow from side to side, his face covered with blood an' dirt an' his white eyes starin' like death. Evrybody helt his breath, expectin' him to drop over dead. Suddenly he come to; he jerked up a tuft o' grass an' swingin' it roun' 'is head fierce he yelled, you could hear 'im four mile.

Nen evrybody, thinkin' o' pop, run to wher he was with his feet hangin' limber down in the hog-scaldin' barrel. They drug 'im out an' rubbed 'im. D'reckly he opened his eyes an' said feeble.

"Jake, what's the price o' seed corn this winter?" He was that onsensible. Nen we got axes an' fence rails an' cut an' pried Misses Oleson out. She kep' moanin' an' moanin' an' moanin'. Purty soon we could make out,

"Whair is my little baby Sam; whair is my little baby Sam; whair is my little baby Sam." And she was leadin' him roun' by 'is little nigger han'. Nex' we looked an' saw Jelly 'bout four mile away still runnin' roun' the end of the slough with his han' on his side pocket.

Nex' day pop, feeble in bed, opened 'is eyes an' ast me.

"Skid, how much did that penitentiary animal beat me out?" Nobody had tol' him cause he was onsensible most o' the time an' besides we was fearin' the shock.

"Seein's it's you, pop, I sh'd say 'bout ten rod. Y'ought n't to've hit the zebra." Nen I hung my head, I felt so bad.

He raised up like that dyin' gladiator he speaks at the literary an' ast agin,

"Was Jelly square on, Skid?" an' I jus' knowed his heart was in his mouth.

"Pop, he reached up an' swiped the purse," I said, ready to bawl.

"Nen, Skid, the dodly blamed all-fired wart mus' be runnin' yit." An' pop turned his face amoinin' to'ards the wall.

THE MAYOR OF TOKIO

Yukio Ozaki, the mayor of Tokio, who was recently in London, has had a varied political career, says the Pall Mall Gazette. The study of John Stuart Mill made him an ardent advocate of representative government in the days when such opinions were held to be treasonable in Japan, so that in 1887 he was deported, and came to England. He returned in 1890, and was elected to the first House of Representatives, where he distinguished himself so highly that in 1897 he was made minister of education. Soon after his appointment he made a speech, in which occurred the words, "Suppose that Japan should ever become a republic." This was considered disrespectful to the Emperor, and Mr. Ozaki had to resign. He is now a parliamentary free lance, and so has found time to serve as Mayor of Tokio since 1903.

"During the past ten years a new profession has come into existence—that of the BUSINESS DOCTOR. Today, when a corporation shows signs of debility, experts are called in from the outside to make a searching examination of the patient and prescribe treatment. Private business has thrown soothing syrups and home cure-alls out of the window and is applying scientific methods to the treatment of its troubles." (The Saturday Evening Post.)

"The valedictorian was a very fluent talker." "What was his address about?" "He didn't say."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"Do you think it will rain on our picnic day?" "Yes." "Do you know when the picnic is to be?" "No."—Buffalo Express.

"How's business?" "Brisk," answered the druggist. "I've bought tickets for two picnics and four excursions this morning, and donated goods for several indoors affairs."—Pittsburg Post.

"You treat that gentleman very respectfully." "Yes, he's one of our early settlers." "An early settler? Why man, he's not more than 40 years old." "No; but he pays his bills on the first of every month."—Cleveland Leader.

Head waiter (dignified and pompous)—Have you ordered, sir? Despairing Patron—Yes, I ordered a porterhouse steak half an hour ago, and I wish to apologize for my rudeness. With your permission I will withdraw it as an order and renew it as a suggestion.—Chicago Tribune.

"You are not tall enough to wear that bathing suit," remonstrated the dark girl. "Don't you know a skirt that ends above the knees makes a girl look shorter?" "I know it makes the men look longer," insinuated the little blonde. And that settled the matter.—New York Times.

Now that day school is out a small Yonkers boy divides his devotion between his Sunday school teacher and his father. The latter is a dentist. "Of course, little ones," said the teacher to her class, one day, "you must all try to be good, and some day you'll wear a golden crown." "I can get a golden crown easier than that," responded the boy. "My pa makes 'em and puts 'em on."—Yonkers Statesman.

A young man called at the office of a justice of the peace, and, with some hesitation, made known his business, which was to get married, says the Youth's Companion. The justice replied that he thought he could perform the service, and asked if the young man had his license. "Yes, sir," the youth replied. "Well, where is the young lady?" "She—she's at her father's. She'd rather be married at home, squire." "And you expect me to go there and marry you?" "Yes, sir, if you please." "Young man," said the justice, "this office of mine is like a department store. We sell matches here, but we don't deliver them at the house."

The late John J. Ingalls, United States senator from Kansas, once told with great glee the story of a joke at his own expense, the humor of which, however, he enjoyed as keenly as if he had not been the victim of it, says the Youth's Companion. "I went one evening," said Mr. Ingalls, "to make a political speech in a small town. I presume the people thought I would have difficulty in filling an hour; at any rate, they called upon the village choir to assist. I trust that the hymns were selected before my arrival, but of that I can not be sure. I know that before the talk the choir sang, 'What Shall the Harvest Be?' and after it 'Nothing But Leaves.'"

Dr. A. M. Worthington of Harvard has announced wittily to the world that the "kiss germ" is a myth, says the New York Times. Apropos of this happy announcement Dr. Worthington said at a dinner in Boston: "So they who frown on the kiss are too exclusive. They are, in fact, as bad as old Dr. Thompson of Cambridge University. Dr. Thompson thought that Cambridge was the finest university in the world. Her rival, Oxford, he despised and abominated. Once, at a dinner, a lady said to the exclusive old man: 'I understand, sir, that the attendance at Oxford has fallen off tremendously. How do you account for it, sir?' 'It must be due,' said Dr. Thompson gruffly, 'to the increase of emigration among the lower classes.'" of wealth, and, second, a government by wealth and for wealth to the degradation if not virtual enslavement of the mass of mankind.

For this reason Venetian history is commended to the student of affairs as being worthy of careful study. We shall never get away from those basic instincts of our common humanity. The Venetians were flesh and blood the same as we are, and if we would seek a different ending for our experiment in free government it must be through holding before our minds' eyes more wholesome ideals than money-getting and greater fears than of "hurting business."

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

All a Matter of Ideals

Last week the young citizen was admonished to look well for the right and wrong of the impending primary issue, and an effort was made to impress upon his mind that, if he will but look, he will be sure to find the fundamental struggle between human rapacity seeking only a selfish gain and an effort to withstand that tendency for the benefit of all.

It does not follow that the rapacious know that they are rapacious any more than that the wolf knows that he is wolfish. The law of the jungle is natural law. In it each seeks his own good unmindful of all the rest, but it was given to man to rise out of the jungle. He can do this only when he fixes his mind on something other than the jungle life. That is, he must have ideals.

Long ago it was written that, "As a man thinketh so is he." As a nation thinketh so is it. Elsewhere in this issue will be found a hasty sketch of the history of the Republic of Venice, which existed under the pretense of being a republic for anyhow seven hundred years after the last vestige of free government had vanished out of its life. The reason for it was that the Venetians lost their ideals of free government. There came a time in the history of that people when they cared more for creature comforts than for the common good, more for pageantries and pleasures than for the Rights of Man. When that time comes in the life of any people that people is drawing near to national death. The rich and powerful were willing enough to take upon themselves the responsibilities and burdens of government and the commonalty became willing enough that they should. When Venetians reached that frame of mind the doom of their republic was sealed. Afterward it was a republic in name only.

Little Switzerland determined to be free. Through all vicissitudes for hundreds of years its people have not lost their ideals of government of the people and for the people. For near to five hundred years it has maintained its independence, and it is Switzerland rather than America that is teaching the world, teaching us how to be free, how to make the will of the people the law of the land. As Switzerland thinketh so is it, a land where justice is swift and sure and the common good is held high above all forms of special privilege.

What this republic is to be depends not upon the fathers, but upon the sons. The fathers wrought well according to their lights. They made mistakes. They made property, rather than manhood, the foundation of social order, but they would not that anyone not of their own free choosing should rule over them. For that, at least, we may honor them. If we lose that ideal we shall be false to them and they will have lived and struggled in vain, for men live in their children and die only when their line runs out.

We have resorted to the direct primary because we found ourselves being ruled by persons not of our free choosing. It is claimed in extenuation that we have nevertheless been ruled well. Without discussing whether we have been ruled well or ill we are no true Americans if we rest content to be ruled by anyone not of our own, free, deliberate, positive choice. "Consent of the governed," does not imply a shiftless and inert acquiescence. It implies positive action. Custom has ordained that the woman may reject an offer of marriage, but may not make such an offer. The free citizen is under no such constraint regarding government. He may not only reject anyone's offer to rule him, but he may command that the one whom he regards as the best man for any given office sacrifice his own preference to serve the common good.

We have resorted to the direct primary because the indirect convention method did permit our judges, all of our men in authority, to be selected for us and not by us. No matter how fit, how disinterested those selected may be we must, as American patriots, denounce and reject them. By "we" we mean the will of the majority directly expressed through the voice of the ballot.

On the 16th of August the men of the political parties contending in California have full freedom of choice as to party candidates within their reach. Whoever has desired to serve the people has had opportunity to make that desire known to the people. Whoever has desired that some other person should be placed in authority has been free to bring that other person's name to the open forum. So far so good. Now it remains to be seen if there be patriotism enough to go forth and make free and positive choice, and whoever is so listless, so indifferent, so negligent as not to avail himself of this opportunity to choose, is at once false to his citizenship and false to those ideals that constitute the nation's only hope. He should suffer some form of public ignominy for his fault.

Mrs. Rebecca Spring of Los Angeles was the guest of honor at a luncheon given the other day by the Friday Morning Club in celebration of her ninety-ninth birthday. Mrs. Spring was a daughter of Arnold Buffum of Providence, R. I., and eighty years ago she married Marcus Spring, who twenty years ago moved to Los Angeles. Mrs. Spring was surrounded at the luncheon by her descendants, one daughter, who is a sculptor and writer; five grandchildren and two great-grandchildren. She reads and writes much, is fond of working in her garden, is interested in reforms, was an abolitionist and is now a suffragist.

Mrs. Maria W. Coronel de Dominguez is said to be the only railroad promoter of her sex in Mexico. She recently perfected all arrangements for the construction of a railroad from Oaxaca to the port of Salina Cruz on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, with a branch line to Puerto Angel on the Pacific coast.

Bertram Mackennal, who has been appointed to design and model the coronation medal and the coinage of the new reign, is an Australian sculptor, born in Melbourne in 1863. He designed and modeled the medals for the Olympic Games of 1908 and was elected an associate of the Royal Academy in 1909, being the first Colonial to achieve that distinction, as he is the first ever called upon to design the English coinage.

The Man

HIRAM JOHNSON is in his prime. He knows how to handle himself. His steering gear is perfect. He cannot be swept off his feet. He has ideals. He has character. He will rise to the requirements of every emergency that confronts him. He is the man to usher in a new era in the political life of California. He made the kind of campaign that he needed to make in order to win at the primaries. Now he will make the kind of campaign that he will need to make in order to win the election. Then he will make the kind of a campaign that he will need to make in order to give California the kind of government it needs, but he will go into office with no trained, obedient, self-abnegating support. There will be no "passing out" the "straight dope" to be swallowed whole and acted upon instantaneously. Good men differ. Bad men can be brought into agreement with one wield of the magic wand of patronage. The new policies will have to be threshed out in conference after conference. The reform element, including Hiram Johnson, will have to give and take, reach a consensus of opinion, make that the policy and march on to victory. In all of it Hiram Johnson will be the leader, not the dictator, and it is a leader and not a dictator that California has been suffering for for forty years. That is the spirit of the newer Republicanism. The railroads will not be hurt. They will see the day when they will be as glad of the change as they now are of governmental regulation. As soon as they have become used to the governmental new era they will have no regret for the passing of the old. Having found The Man it only remains to turn to and make him governor. We can do it. We must.

Because They Are Black

THERE IS JOY IN DIXIE among "White Republicans of standing and position," over the fact that the President has turned out of office, because they are black, men whom Theodore Roosevelt had appointed to office notwithstanding that they were black. The problem is difficult. None more so. A dozen millions of black folks in this country may get on without social equality, certainly without social acceptability, but can they without civil? No answer will be attempted. It is sufficient to note that President Taft took the direction of least resistance in the matter, Theodore Roosevelt the direction of the greatest. Could anything be more characteristic of the men?

That Eastern View

ELSEWHERE IN THIS PAPER will be found an anonymous Eastern view of what San Francisco ought to do with reference to the grafters. This paper dissents. It savors too much of forgiving the fellow one can't lick and licking the fellow one does not have to forgive. The grafting was venial compared with the debauching of public sentiment and crushing of justice. The shadow of the law should hover over the grafters to the latest moment, then they should be suffered to go their way followed by a faraway look in the public eye. It will be time to forgive when they ask it. There is no law human or divine that requires forgiveness in advance of the asking, or in advance of sorrow for the sin, as distinguished from sorrow for the sinner.

We Are It

THE LINCOLN-ROOSEVELT Republican League is no more. It is now the "regular" Republican party of California and every Republican who wishes to maintain his "regularity" should make haste to get aboard the "regular" bandwagon which is about to start. Plenty of seats specially reserved at the tail end. The amen corner is occupied by the progressives. The platform will be of their making.

Has the President Heard?

DID THE SOUND waves from the Pacific break on the shores of the Atlantic down at Beverly? Did they make a noise like standpatism in distress? Will the President send us Murray Crane to smooth our ruffled feathers and bid us be calm and content with things as they were lest we disrupt the party by tearing a few corporation hirelings to tatters? If the President heaves a sigh over California let him remember that when he was in San Francisco he confronted one of the greatest moral issues of his time and yet went his way saying not a word. It was not until the 16th of August that the Republicans of California had a chance to say what they thought of his side-stepping that issue. Then they spoke. Did he hear it?

Biffed

THEODORE ROOSEVELT spoke for the direct primary system in New York. The "organization" turned him down. They had biffed him on the right cheek. He was asked if he would accept the temporary chairmanship of the Republican state convention. He said he would if he could speak for the right kind of man and the right kind of platform. The "organization" turned him down in favor of Vice-President Sherman, who will be content with any sort of man on any sort of platform. They had biffed him on the other cheek. Unless that African trip took the fight all out of him the next pass will set Theodore in action and a roar will come up from Oyster Bay that will make "organization" politicians think that a tidal wave is at their heels. Hope they will make that pass. They are just fools enough to do it.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON

Freedom In Sight

After forty years in the wilderness of corporation domination California is now in sight of the Promised Land of Liberty and free government. It was a great contest, of Tuesday last, and the victory was well earned. Forty years from now grizzled men will be telling their grandsons how, in 1910, they cast their first votes to make California a free state. They will tell of the splendid campaign made by their leader, Hiram W. Johnson, and they will say: "Ah! in those days there were men."

Without money, without a political machine, with nothing but a righteous cause, boundless enthusiasm and a fixed purpose, a great people was made to see and know the truth and the truth made them free. This paper had little doubt of the result. There is little reason for doubt whenever all of the people turn out, but oh! how hard it is to get all the people set in motion. It is a burden that ought not to be inflicted upon the few. How shall that burden be lightened?

But it will not be enough to make California free. Our state must use its freedom well or lose it. There is much to do. Hiram Johnson cannot be all or do all that must be and be done. He can only lead. That he can do and that he will do. The curse of bondage is that only third or fourth rate men are available for public affairs. Free government cannot be a success except it fetch into public life its best men. Public life must be made attractive to them. The task of bringing them out of the avenues of private occupation and inducting them into public service will not be easy. Governor Pardee essayed to do it and found it hard. So little honor has gone with office under bondage that office became acceptable for the emoluments rather than for the office. Only by making office honorable can honor-loving men be induced to take office, and without honor-loving men in office, men who take office that they may serve the public rather than feather their own nests, free government must fail. The task set for the newer Republicanism is not small, nor is it too great. It is such a task as will call forth Men.

The primary election was a crucial test, but it does not end the fight. The citadel of the enemy has been taken, but he has not capitulated. It will take a fortnight to clarify the political atmosphere and sense the temper of those who have passed through the late unpleasantness. The campaign of the "organization" has been characterized by imbecility. The "organization" knows how to "play the game," but, confronted by a moral enthusiasm, they are helpless for the reason that they do not know what a moral enthusiasm is when they see one manifested. It is not of their world. Never having experienced such an enthusiasm in their lives they are dead to it and are made vulnerable by it. They have been unhorsed but not disarmed. Whipped in the open they will take to the brush, and to the brush and through the brush they must be pursued until they surrender.

Bonds For the Fair

The Panama-Pacific exposition project is taking definite financial form. By private subscription $7,500,000 is to be pledged, the State of California is to be asked to vote $5,000,000, the city and county of San Francisco $5,000,000, making $17,500,000 for one grand "Blowout" that will last half a year!

That it will do good no one can question. That the same amount of money could be made to do ten, twenty, forty, a hundred-fold more good few who have the power to put pencil to paper intelligently will dispute. Only the effervescent, hotheaded, vociferating boomers will attempt it, and with them calm discussion is not to be looked for.

Let us see what might be done with these three several sums if put to wiser uses. San Francisco's industries and her commerce languish. Where there were a hundred iron workers before the fire there are now not a score, perhaps not ten. Our oversea commerce has taken to itself wings and has not returned. Put that $7,500,000 to the credit of the Chamber of Commerce, with instructions to expend a million a year until exhausted in opening up trade with China, the Philippines, Australia and India; in studying the needs of those and other markets and finding methods of supplying them from this port; devote that seven and a half millions in money, and seven and a half years in time, to finding out how to make a dollar in San Francisco, otherwise than by retail trade, running a hotel, a restaurant, or a saloon, with the night life wide open, and the results will discount the Panama-Pacific exposition so far as to make its promoters deny that they ever entertained such an idea in their minds.

Now take the state's $5,000,000 donation. Send our congressional delegation back to Washington with a proposal that, if the national government will put up dollar for dollar with the state, the landowners will contribute enough more to reclaim to settlement the million acres of swamp and overflowed lands in the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys. No richer land lays out of doors. It will make 50,000 twenty-acre farms and add a population of 250,000 to San Francisco's back country, a never failing source of wealth. With a tenth of the expenditure of energy that will be required to get up the great exposition this result can be achieved and our great inland valleys be made a double cornucopia pouring wealth into the lap of San Francisco.

Take the $5,000,000 in bonds proposed to be devoted to the exposition by San Francisco! Devote it to such an extension of the Geary street railway system as will make accessible the near-by districts of the peninsula for the accommodation of citizens. Or establish playgrounds with it, small parks and boulevards, that San Francisco may be not only the city beautiful, but the city homelike, clean and moral. The expenditure of the credit would furnish as much labor devoted to these purposes as to another, and give the city an enviable reputation among men.

And there would be no period of reaction to go through, no surplus population to float away, no useless hotels to injure legitimate hotel trade. What San Francisco needs is something like the "1915" spirit that has taken hold of Boston. That would be something like.

But what can one little weekly paper do to stem the tide of misapplied capital and enthusiasm! It can have its say, that's all, and, having had it, it can take hold with the rest and do its best for what the rest think best. California can better afford to vote $5,000,000 for a 1915 "Blowout" than San Francisco can afford to vote another $5,000,000 to the same end, and then bear its share of what the state votes. Having spent a few days at the fair our visitors will hie away to Southern California to spend as many weeks there as they have spent days here before going home, and they will spend dollars in other portions of the state to dimes in San Francisco. Everywhere, outside of San Francisco, it will be much to gain and relatively little to lose, while in San Francisco there will be much to lose and relatively little to gain compared to what might be realized could the same energy and enthusiasm, the same capital and enterprise, be directed to wiser ends.

But let there be one Panama exposition or none! Anyhow, stick a peg there to stay.

All There Is In Conservation

In an address at Klamath Falls, Secretary Ballinger is reported as saying that, "The time has now come when we have got to be frugally economical, and we have got to use common sense in the handling of the resources we have. That is all there is in conservation."

That shows how little of a conservationist Secretary Ballinger is. Frugal economy is part of it; common sense must be the foundation for it, but for whose benefit is this frugality to be practiced? For whose advantage is this common sense to be exercised? It is not enough that our resources be conserved. They must be conserved for the common welfare, not for the huge special value of the privileged few. At best Richard Achilles Ballinger is only a half-breed conservationist. He should give place to a stalwart.

With the exception of the pre-emption, the homestead and the timber claim acts, the policy of our government toward the public domain has been characterized by imbecility, not common sense, and the imbecility of that policy has been due to the truth that an imbecile policy best fitted the requirements of the land-grabbers. It served their purposes better to secure absolute title through dummy locators than a conserved and regulated use under governmental supervision. Nothing should ever have been sold or given away that could not be made into a home, and nothing should be held in perpetuity by the government that can be made into a home. All the rest must be conserved, regulated, supervised by government, but for the common good.

It is the speculative interest that mainly needs to be conserved for the common good. Under the swamp land acts speculators, in passing the land from its watery condition to reclamation and settlement, have made, not hundreds per cent on their investment, but thousands. The great timber speculators, the coal barons, the owners of iron ore, have done as well. It has been estimated that the "Morganheiming" of Alaska will, if the promoters have their way with the government, yield them 5000 per cent on their investments.

The transmission of electric energy is so cheap when generated by water power that power for use in the oil districts of California is being furnished at a price that forbids the owners of oil and gas wells generating their own electricity though they have their fuel virtually free. That the promoters of hydro-electric development if left to themselves will make hundreds per cent on their investment is not beyond reasonable expectation.

Now conservation, in its true sense, means conserving to the consuming millions the speculative value between a resource in its natural state and a resource developed and made serviceable. To the developer should go a liberal recompense to compensate him for his enterprise and his energy. To the public service or other corporation that afterwards takes the product in its raw state and makes a commodity out of it should be ungrudgingly yielded a fair rate of income on a fair capitalization, such a rate as, in a generation, may return the original investment together with a fair annual interest, meantime, on that investment. Whatever is more than this is exploitation, not conservation, and not to be tolerated if free government shall make shift to govern in the interests of the many instead of the few.

This issue will come before congress for action this coming winter. Our national resources, whether in Alaska or in the states of this Union, are not to be locked up, but it were better that they remained locked for a hundred years than that they be unlocked to the speculator, the exploiter and the grabber rather than to the consuming millions.

There is more in conservation than Ballinger, his backers and his apologists, have dreamed of in their philosophy.

A Question of Red Tape

Florence Nightingale is dead. The world says, "ah-ha!" and passes on. Not one in a thousand could have told off-hand whether she were dead or living, but the presumption would have been that she had slept decades. So is it with one who lags upon the stage after her work is done. Julia Ward Howe's work isn't done yet, although she was born a year earlier. But Florence Nightingale showed the world what a woman with a will could do at a time when men stood in the midst of death tied with red tape. On shipboard in the offing were all the things the British soldiers needed and for the want of which those soldiers were dying by the hundreds, yes, by the thousands. The officers said the things could not be got at. The woman said they could. They were. The woman found her way to the heart of the trouble and the heart of the world. As the breast of the nightingale sets millions of tons of air to pulsating with its song so the will of this woman moved mountains and saved men. She made the army nurse as much a part of the army as the artillery. It is not well so soon to forget such transcendent personalities.

Let the Women Have a Say

Of each hundred pupils in the normal schools of California ninety odd are young women. Of each hundred teachers in the public schools of California eighty-nine are women. But on the boards of trustees of the normal schools of California there is not one woman. Does that seem to be quite a square deal? There are business interests connected with the normal schools with which men may be supposed to be best equipped to deal, but there are social values there for the guarding of which the intuitive genius of women may be more safely relied on. The case of Van Liew emphasizes this truth. Had there been two women on the board of trustees of the Chico normal they would have long since gotten to the bottom of that situation. Had there been any miscellaneous hugging going on it would have come to their knowledge. If there had not been, if the principal of that school had been made the victim of a put-up job, those women trustees would have learned that, too. Had there been anything unwholesome in that atmosphere their olfactories would have scented it. The California Weekly makes bold to suggest that two out of five in the directorate of each of the normal schools of this state be women. If the other trustees, the men principals and teachers in the normal schools, object to this then we favor filling three of the places on each board with representative women of California. As to material to select from the club life of California has developed an embarrassment of riches. To accomplish this our governors will have to forego politics, but that will hurt neither the schools, the state, nor the governors.

The Temptation of Theodore Bell

The crucial test of character is the ability to "Swear to one's own hurt and change not." Can Theodore Bell stand that test? Thousands of voters are asking this in their hearts. Four years ago Bell made a campaign only less brilliant than that just made by Hiram Johnson and upon a similar issue. He came near to winning, but, running against Hiram Johnson on that issue, Theodore Bell will have no chance of winning. There are not Democratic votes enough in California to elect anybody to anything. Bell's only hope lies in a division in the ranks of the Republican party. Had Curry or Anderson been nominated by the Republicans nothing that Johnson or the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League could have done to hold their followers to party lines would have prevented tens of thousands of them breaking out of the reservation and voting for Bell. Was that Bell's only chance?

In the congressional election of 1902, the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company came to the rescue of Bell's fight, very likely without Bell's knowledge, with $2,500 and all the influence it could muster, but it was not that the bureau cared for, or had any hold upon, Bell. The Herrin machine wished to defeat Frank L. Coombs, who had proven independent, and did it. Will that Bureau pursue the same policy this time? Not alone to punish Hiram Johnson, for Bell, too, has been obstreperous, but that Republican insurgency may be punished! From out of the East come persistent rumors that Republican "regulars" prefer to see Democrats rather than insurgents elected. Do California "regulars" feel so, too?

This paper does not believe that Theodore Bell can be caved down that bank. He has seen subserviency so empty a gubernatorial office of honor as to leave behind no trace of reputability that would be accorded precedence outside of a political tenderloin. Our belief is that Bell will stand in the future, as he has stood in the past, for a free Democratic party and a free state. He will make his battle more in the hope of re-creating the Democratic party than of being made governor of California.

But this affords no assurance that the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau may not throw its strength to Theodore Bell. There is an able bodied fight ahead of progressive Republicanism in this state and it is not impossible that party lines may be as nearly obliterated in the November election as they were in the August primaries. When the Men of California see the line-up they will know how to vote without being told and the line-up will be made clear before the campaign will have waxed a month old.

Short Weight

Not alone have prices gone up but packages have systematically shrunk all over the country. Wherever wrappings are cheaper than the commodity wrapped the commodity is incased like a mummy in wrapping after wrapping, and the purchaser pays for it all by the pound. What one manufacturer does in the way of scrimping another imitates, a custom is established, and to follow an established custom, however dishonest, is looked upon as fulfilling the law of probity. If there be anything more uncommon than common sense it is common honesty. Not only must we fight to make products pure and true to name, but to get full measure and full weight.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

If one wake up in the lone watches oppressed by the greedy unconcern of those who seek only for self regardless of the well-being of the race, he is apt to feel that, if God be not so abounding in mercy as to be wholly unjust, somewhere, somehow, some time, these heedless workers in public iniquity must be roundly come up with; that when they go to their place—it is shocking to speak of it as hell, for we are "wae to think on yon den" e'en for the sake of "auld Nickey Ben." It is not much better to call it hades. Let us, therefore, think of it as the place, or the condition, of impassioned regretfulness for a misspent life. Well, one is apt to think of that place being peopled almost wholly by scalawag politicians and enemies of the public welfare.

But, upon reflection, we cannot avoid the conclusion that there are other roads that lead to that same place, other open doors to the same abode of impassioned regretfulness. There are those who are unjust, yet generous, and there are those who are as just as their preconceived notions will permit them to be, but who are wholly ungenerous. Their hatred of evil goes so far as to hate the evil doer. They have faith, faith that the worker in social iniquity may be punished; they have hope, hope that the dross will be burnt out of the world as by fire, but they have not charity. Being the greatest of all the virtues charity hangs out of their reach. They cannot attain unto it, and, somewhere, sometime, they, too, may find themselves in the place, or condition, of impassioned regretfulness because of the dulled, hard edge they kept upon their affections, their sympathies, their compassion.

Yes, there are ways of reaching impassioned regretfulness other than by giving the mastery to an unbridled acquisitive faculty. That reaching out to grasp all of the sources of wealth for which the thoughtful world is so deeply concerned is an excess of virtue rather than a vice, and an excess of virtue is to be preferred to a lack of it. The money-mad men are doers and it need occasion no surprise if, on the last day, we find that, what with weighing and balancing, the Father of us all has graded even the most grasping of them as high as some of those who have droned their ways through life doing neither good nor evil, seeking only pleasure, or self culture, tranquility or unspottedness from the world. The religion of the Christ is a religion of action. It terminates in no Brahmanical Nirvana.

This is not to say that greed is not damning, but only that other things are so, too. Nor is it intended to imply that, because other things are just as bad as unrestrained greed, therefore unrestrained greed cannot be so very bad after all. By such processes of pretended reasoning we upset our understandings and lose our moral bearings. How often do we hear it said that such or such a wrong is no worse than such or such another wrong; that avarice is no worse than hatred, greed than lust, theft than lying, drunkenness than gluttony. All true enough and all bad enough, all so bad that if one fetches us to impassioned regretfulness any of the others will do likewise.

There is no greater sinner than he who would corrupt another's power to distinguish between good and evil, and perhaps there is no greater servant of his kind that he who can make us all see with clarity of vision the difference between that which is soundly good and that which is certainly evil. If we will walk in wrong paths let us at least be brave enough to walk with our eyes unbound. Let us choose the evil rather than the good if it suits us better, but let us not add to that sin the sin of trying to deceive ourselves as to what is right and what is wrong. That is cowardice. Blind man's buff is a good game, but a bad habit of life.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Where Islamism Beats Christianity

There appears to be a consensus of opinion among those who are best situated to know that Mohammedanism is gaining converts among the native tribes of Africa more rapidly than is Christianity. For instance, the Berlin missionary society, in its report for 1909, directly admits that unless strenuous efforts are made by Christian missions to counteract the present tendency, East Africa surely will become Mohammedan within the next half century or so. This is high authority which may be presumed to look upon the situation as hopefully as is possible. Nor is this trend confined to German East Africa. For example, travelers in Abyssinia a half century ago reported that the two Mensa tribes were Christian—such Christianity as it was, presumably. Now Professor Enno Littmann of Strassburg university reports that this was the case, but that these tribes now have been converted to Islamism, till very few members now profess the Christian faith. Other authorities might be cited, too, but these probably are enough to convince that there is a very potent possibility that the natives of Africa may become followers of Mahomet rather than of Christ; and the Moslem knows how to engender a hatred of all things Christian in his converts.

What Becomes of the Pennies?

A penny is a coin of small consequence, but—what becomes of all of them? There is a question to give the thoughtful pause, and answer there is none. The Philadelphia mint, which coins all pennies, sends out as many as one hundred millions of them in some years, and it does not greatly fall below this number. These do service for a brief time, and after that nobody knows what becomes of them. Inspect the pennies in your pocket. Whether you have one or a dozen of them, the chances are fair that there is not one coined within the last five years. The fact is that most of the pennies have gone within five years, almost all have gone within ten years, and nobody knows where they went or in what manner they disappeared. If those that were coined ten years ago were placed side by side, and touching one another, they would reach more than a thousand miles, yet if you wished just one of that multitude the chances are that you would search long before you would find it? In what innumerable earth-crannies are they hidden, that they may not be found? What gnomes or earth-sprites have buried them in unguessable places? In short, where is some fraction of this flood of pennies? Give it up? Never mind; so does everybody.

So That Aviators May Land Gently

The science of aviation is young, but it did not need to be old in order to lead to the discovery that a fall, whether of 50 or 5,000 feet, is likely to inconvenience the aviator. The discovery having been made, aviators, and particularly those of France, where the science of aviation has made the most progress, have attempted to devise some means by which the gloom of a fall would be lessened. Such plans still are in the suggestive stage, but aviation experts appear to be centering particularly on two. First, in the event of a short fall of, say, from fifty to two or three hundred feet, the bird man or woman should be encased in pneumatic armor, presenting the appearance of a football player, only more so. Of course a person thus protected would be likely to bound and continue to bound for some time after striking the ground, but the interested spectators could rush in and catch him when they concluded he had bounded long enough. A cheerful aviatory diversion, too, could be introduced at this stage by making it a rule of the game that he should be counted out if caught on the first bound, but not otherwise. In the second place, and in the event of a long fall, the aeroplane would be equipped with an automatic parachute guaranteed to work in the event of a tumble. In this case, of course, the rule should provide that the aviator must be caught on the fly or he would not be counted out. However, this is making light of serious things, and it need not be said that it really is of gravest importance that some method of guarding against the effects of falls must be found if aviation ever is to be entirely successful; and sooner or later such a method will be discovered.

Cost of Living Increases Everywhere

American housewives may find some small consolation in the reflection that they are not alone in their daily disheartening struggle to "make both ends meet" while the cost of living constantly increases. Throughout the civilized world the same protesting cry goes up. Look at Germany, for instance. There is no people more thrifty and economical than are the Germans. Yet in the Kaiser's provident realm the hausfrau is finding it difficult to make the income equal the outgo. Within five years her household expenses, it is statistically shown, have increased twenty per cent. Six dollars go no farther than five formerly did, and in too large a proportion of instances the sixth dollar has not been forthcoming. Meat is higher, so are butter, eggs, coffee and the general list of things, and, to add the final blow, there is an increased tax of a cent a gallon on beer—which is adding inhumanity to cruelty, in Germany. English housewives, French, Italian, Swedish—from these and all others goes up the voice of lamentation because of the situation, and if there be any consolation for American housekeepers in this fact, it is abundantly theirs.

Amputation by Electricity

Now a French surgeon named D'Arsonval steps to the front with a theory that the really scientific and admirable way of amputating limbs would be by the use of electricity. He has tried his method on lower animals with entire success, but has not as yet tried it on man, although he greatly desires to do so. The method consists of passing an electric current of high voltage through the part where the limb is to be amputated. The process is said to be entirely painless, but it results in so cooking that part of the limb that in a few days it falls off, leaving the stump perfectly cicatrized. In brief, then, the French surgeon claims that his method is painless and that it results in a more perfect operation than otherwise is possible. He should know whereof he speaks, too, for undoubtedly electricity would act on men precisely as it does on lower animals. It may be that we are standing at the dawn of a new era in surgery, so far as amputations are concerned.

The World's Greatest Warship

The world's greatest battleship is about to be built by a British firm. When completed it will belong to the navy of Brazil, and its name will be Rio de Janeiro. The vessel will be 655 feet (two city blocks) in length, and 92 feet in width, and its cost is estimated at $14,500,000. Its comparison with the greatest vessels of other nations follows: The Rio de Janeiro, of Brazil, 32,000 tonnage, carries twelve 14-inch guns; Moreno, of Argentina, 28,000 tonnage, carries twelve 12-inch guns; Arkansas, of the United States, 26,000 tonnage, carries twelve 12-inch guns; Wyoming, of the United States, 26,000 tonnage, carries twelve 12-inch guns; Oldenburg, of Germany, 23,000 tonnage, carries twelve 12-inch guns; Tegetthoff, of Austria, 21,000 tonnage, carries twelve 12-inch guns; Orion, of Great Britain, 22,000 tonnage, carries ten 12-inch guns. There is a total of well toward $100,000,000 (say, enough to feed a half million people for a year) invested in just seven warships, and every one of them will be obsolete in a decade or so. The Rio de Janeiro will be the greatest of the lot, but it is a mad competition, and nobody could foretell how long it will remain so.

Why English Railroad Men Are Proud

It is reported that English railroad men are proud of the record made by their roads during the year 1909, and, accepting the record at its face value, as we probably should, it is clear that they have a right to be so. During the year 1,264,900 passengers were carried, and of these but one was killed by an accident to a train, although nineteen were killed while getting on or off trains. Commuters are not included in these figures, but not one of them was killed. Of this great total of passengers, too, but 390 were injured. It is a remarkable record, and it is one that will not be equalled this year, as two or three accidents involving the killing of several people already have taken place.

Our New National Forest

The daily papers have published little concerning the national forest reservation recently created in California, which will be known as the Eldorado. Nevertheless it may be considered of considerable interest to the people of this state. It consists of 809,910 acres (an area more than equal to that of Rhode Island, or five-eighths that of Delaware), and it is composed of the southern part of Tahoe national forest and 31,701 additional acres taken from the national domain. The headquarters of this reservation are to be at Placerville. The total number of national forests now is 151. To the Tahoe forest reservation 125,761 acres were added, while 7,678 acres were taken from it. The Plumas reservation gained 31,192 acres and lost 1,940 acres.

Not Hard Times in the Art World

Between April 7 and July 14 of this year, or in a little more than three months, there were eleven sales of collections of paintings and engravings at Christie's in London, and the total of prices paid for these pictures was $2,763,380. The individual who suggested that these are hard times evidently did not have his eye on the world of art.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

THE METEOR

By Joseph K. Hutchinson

(Written for the California Weekly)

Mighty I rise,
Until each toiling planet of the sky
Beneath is hurled;
Set I my lust upon a star, and cry:
"It is my world!"

Savage I leap;
Brutal I strike the heart of night; I stay
The heaven's aim;
Hark, how I roar upon my astral prey
And crush its flame!

OF RULES FOR LITERARY ART

Certain absurd attempts are nowadays made to fix the technical limits of the short story. A distinguished periodical, noted for the high quality of its fiction, recently announced with an air of solemn conviction that one inviolable rule of the short story is that it shall treat of only one incident and of that incident only at its crisis. This statement is but another manifestation of that classical spirit which has done so much to preserve the achievements of the past and so much to oppose the progress of the present. It is a manifestation of a powerful tendency of mankind to fix certain definite rules for everything, to analyze, classify, and set in unbreakable moulds an authorized coinage for each art, transgression of which is imputed to be a degradation of the currency.

As a matter of fact there are no rules for a work of art that a master may not break—indeed, a masterpiece cannot be produced without breaking some of the accepted generalizations—and break with advantage if it suits his peculiar genius to express itself otherwise than by the rule. And it is futile to lay down such rules for an additional reason, which is this: the only person for whom the rule could conceivably be profitable is the creative artist himself, and he must make his own rules or he cannot create. As for the reader, the only rule he needs, the only test that is not an injury to his pleasure instead of an aid, is the test of enjoyment of what he reads. It is wholly superfluous for him to know why he enjoys: enjoyment is his whole aim. In fact, it is part of the art of the author to conceal from the reader the mechanism whereby he produces this enjoyable sensation in the reader. Man gains no added power of pleasure, when contemplating the innocent loveliness of a young girl, by knowing the intricate and marvelous mechanism of nerves and blood vessels that give her life and motion. And, to carry the analogy further, and to a completer revelation of our meaning, suppose man knew, to the minutest fact of growth and function, this mechanism of life, even then he would be as far as ever from understanding what was the essence that makes her lovely and the lack of which makes her sister only tolerably attractive.

So with the work of creative literary artists. Even where they are, as Stevenson was, acutely conscious of the mechanism whereby they achieve their effects, they themselves still do not understand the source and character of the added something, the individual essence, that makes their work different and endues it with an elusive and inimitable charm. It is to define this innate quality that the word "genius" is used, and it cannot be too strongly stated that the artist himself is as ignorant of the nature and laws of his own genius as anybody else. He may stand off and seek to analyze it, as Poe did, but his analysis is exactly as much outside and useless as that of any other person. Genius eludes the efforts of even its possessors to catch and fix its outlines.

So, returning to our original proposition, how futile is the attempt to mark out definite boundaries for a certain classification of art. The artist is a law to himself. When he strives to obey somebody else's so-called law, he sinks from the rank of creator to the rank of imitator.

This point is scarcely worth the making, were it not that so much of readers' capacity for enjoyment is diminished by it. We know many ardent lovers of books whose enjoyment of favorite writers has been disturbed by questionings raised by these attempts at classification. The safe rule is to throw the classicists to the winds and read where you enjoy. The great writer is he whose books appeal to people after endless re-readings. There is no Shakespeare cult, for you will find enjoyment of Shakespeare in every stratum above illiteracy. There is no need to classify "The Merchant of Venice" as a comedy or as a comi-tragedy, or as anything else but a most enjoyable play, either to read or see.

So with all literature. The personal, individual pleasure, your pleasure, in it is the thing.

PERSONALIA

Miss Alice Longfellow, a daughter of the poet, has been elected vice-president of the recently organized Society for the Preservation of New England Antiquities. The object of the organization is the preservation of buildings and sites of historical interest.

Edward Sheldon has been abroad for some months putting the finishing touches on his new play, "The Murder," in which Florence Roberts will star.

David Belasco has at last made public his plans for Blanche Bates for next season. She is to star in a new play by Avery Hopwood, called "The One Woman."

MARKET DAY

By Daniel O'Connell

See Maggie in the morning spring up and seize her basket,
While Alice, drowsy Alice, lies prone between the sheets;
But Maggie, rosy Maggie, the household queen, whose task it
Is to go to market, trips along the silent streets.

Fair goddess of the dawning, the opening buds, the grasses,
All glistening in the night dews, are not fresher than her face;
The birds, but half-awakened, salute her as she passes,
The tall trees bend in homage to her beauty and her grace.

As she moves among the farmers, they know well that the cherries
Wear no hue that can be likened to the ruby of her lips.
Mark the snowy hand that picks out the largest, ripest berries, Staining with their crimson juices her dainty finger tips.

They look after her and bless her,—and the coin her hands have clung to
Is cherished as a talisman from one so fair and bright.
Were yon rustic but a Corydon, he surely would have sung to This Aurora buying butter in the early morning light.

Were I thy lover, Maggie, they should paint thy picture, dearest,—
Not dressed in gleaming satin, the splendor of the feast,
But arrayed in market costume, the same plain dress thou wearest,
With thy pouting lips preparing yon golden roll to taste.

OF LOVE INTEREST IN BOOKS

Playwrights especially find that the public demands a love interest in most of their productions, that without the heart thrill of sentiment the play seems to lack something necessary to make it complete. Novelists have learned the same lesson. Why is this demand so insistent?

A wise man once replied to this question, that the only dramatic event in the lives of most people is their courtship. The ordinary man or woman lives apart from active participation in the great currents of affairs. Few people have to do with the intrigues of policy or the vicissitudes of war. It is rare, comparatively, that a man or woman is involved in an encounter where life is endangered. In other words, the ordinary man or woman rarely experiences the great emotions that lift being out of the commonplace rut to exalted states of excited feeling.

But nearly every man and woman has had one such experience, the experience of falling in love. Nearly every one has felt that exaltation, and remembers how it altered and glorified his whole existence, how it colored the landscape and the sky, how it made him, for the time, a different being in a strange and alluring world. This emotional experience lasted throughout the days of courtship.

Why, then, does the average story end with "and they married and lived happily ever after?" Because marriage usually ends the dream. This is said in no cynical spirit at all, for even in the happiest marriages there comes the end of this golden mirage, a descent from exalted emotion, a routine acceptance of happiness. The reason the dramatist and the novelist—who is a dramatist without a stage—must leave their characters at the altar is that happiness is not dramatic. The pursuit of happiness is dramatic, the dawning of love, the struggle to arouse it in another, the courtship, the capture, the surrender—here are dramatic episodes, the clash of interests, the contrast of characters. Love is a storm, marriage is a calm.

And the reason, then, why the novelist must introduce a heart interest in his story is that love is the one universal passion, love is the one dramatic experience that everybody has undergone and appreciates. We may understand, sympathetically and by a stretch of the imagination, the emotional experiences of a sailor beset by a tempest, or of a soldier breasting the charge, but the representation of love is intelligible to all of us so much more vividly and intimately because we have ourselves experienced it in our own lives. And love is almost the only dramatic incident that is of universal experience.

There is this added reason for our appreciation of love scenes: love is one of the few things that are essentially dramatic that are also pleasant. Nearly all other dramatic episodes are dramatic because they have a dark side. It is easy to conceive of the dramatic possibilities of war, of personal conflict, of the dangers of death, of heroism—which is the disregard of danger—of any human experience that leads toward unhappiness. Love, alone, pleases while it stirs us.

HARDY'S HEROES AND HEROINES

J. M. Barrie has analyzed the novels of Thomas Hardy's, says the New York Dramatic Mirror, and found in them eight heroines, with twenty-two lovers, with incidents that lead to eleven secret engagements, three marriages and three elopements that come to nothing. "Nearly every one of the ladies practically proposes to at least one man, and two run after him to do so, and one of them then marries another. Were these eight ladies to meet their twenty-two lovers in, say, the market place of Casterbridge, there would, one feels, be a strange reshuffling of cards." Mr. Barrie claims that Mr. Hardy's heroines are the most charming in their womanliness and the most subtly drawn, with the exception of Meredith's, of this generation of novelists.

AN EASTERN VIEW

OF SAN FRANCISCO'S PRESENT CIVIC CONDITION

A distinguished student of civics and economics recently visited San Francisco from the East. His name cannot be disclosed, but his ideas about the present status of certain important matters in this city were so stimulating to the present writer that they are worth reviewing. This gentleman has long been familiar with San Francisco's municipal problems. He has made numerous visits to the city and has always kept in touch with it through correspondence. He speaks, therefore, with knowledge, and his words carry added suggestiveness by reason of the fact that they are from the fresh viewpoint of an outsider who sees the subject in perspective with similar problems elsewhere and with the eyes of a disinterested but friendly critic.

It should here be pointed out that The California Weekly takes no responsibility for the ideas advanced by this gentleman. They are published because they are interesting and significant. They are, substantially, as follows:

San Francisco, in spite of the exposures of corruption and in spite of the desperate, and now probably successful, efforts to defeat the law, is really in a civic condition far better than that of any other city in America. This sounds like a contradiction, but it is not, as an illustration will show:

Talk to a resident of San Francisco about the condition of the city, paint that condition as black as you will, accuse the citizenry of civic turpitude as profound as you will—and the San Franciscan will make no defense. This is typically true. It means, to use the language of Methodists, that San Francisco is "under conviction for sin," a condition as hopeful for better things in civics as the like condition is for salvation in religion.

But try to point out to the resident of any other city the evils that underlie its municipal life—the same evils that flourished in San Francisco, only not exposed with such dramatic incident—and he will say, "Oh, perhaps some things are wrong, but, you know, we're not really so bad, not half so bad as San Francisco, for instance." This, also, is typically true. And this means that the other cities of the country have not yet come to the realization of their fallen estate, which is the first and indispensable prerequisite of better things.

In other words, San Francisco has learned humility. The city has reached the state of mind where it knows that it needs improvement and is willing to accept the councils of wisdom for the working out of its salvation. This is a tremendous gain.

Another thing: I don't know how I should act, if I went to war, on the field of my first battle. I wish mightily that I did know. I wish fervently that I could know that I would not run. But I don't know. But here in San Francisco your people have been through not only that first battle but through a long war. Every man in your citizenry has been under fire, shot at from the front and both flanks, tried by every test of courage. And from this ordeal many have come out with the Red Badge of Courage. You know that there are twenty-five thousand men in San Francisco that no danger can daunt, no illusion deceive. That twenty-five thousand can be counted on, as one man, in every emergency, to stand for right to the last extremity. Think what a tremendous asset that is, what an advantage it gives you over other cities. No man, fighting for decency in San Francisco, feels alone. He knows that he has these thousands of tried fellow-fighters who will back him to the last ditch.

And, again, San Francisco now knows very definitely what its problems are, what its weaknesses are, where it needs constructive work to build up the structure of civic life.

At this point it is well to outline our visitor's idea of the importance of the municipal problem. The problem of the twentieth century is the problem of the city. The world has had as great soldiers as it will ever see, as great orators as it will ever hear. But it has never yet had a great governor, an administrator who really solved the problem of administering the laws for the best good of the people. And the place where the problem of administration is most complex is in the huge cities of the present day, where vast bodies of people congregate, where distinctions of wealth and poverty are most sharply contrasted, and where the problem of getting government to come really from the people and of administering government equitably in the interest of all the people is so complicated.

It should be noted, too, at this point, that American cities are in many respects behind European cities in this problem of administration. Public sentiment has not been educated to expect works from municipal administrations that have been matters of course for years in European countries.

Now to return to the specific question of San Francisco: The graft prosecutions have achieved the benefits outlined in the first of this article: the consciousness of evils to be corrected and the knowledge of the existence of a dependable army for the right. But they have also brought dissension. They have drawn a line straight down through the middle of the people, and arrayed half the citizens against the other half. As long as this condition of division, marked by bitterness of feelings, exists there is small room for improvement. This breach must be healed.

In other words, the time has come, in the graft prosecutions, when they must be ended one way or the other: either the indicted men must be convicted or the prosecutions must be closed. But the important thing is to end them, and quickly. Remove them as a source of bad feeling, put them behind us, forget them, and everybody get together in a movement for constructive work to make San Francisco a united and progressive city.

It now seems probable that the indicted men cannot be convicted. If this be the consensus of opinion, the thing to do is to dismiss the indictments and put the prosecutions away from us as matters of history. This policy is advisable for several reasons, but one reason, additional to those suggested above, is noteworthy: the indicted men have undoubtedly been punished by the prosecutions. They have cost them anxiety, heartburnings and much money. But the important thing is, they have cost them probings of their consciences. These men now know that they did wrong. Naturally, as long as society has them at bay, with the penalty of prison staring them in the face, they are not going to confess that they did wrong. As long as society fights them, they are going to fight back. But in their hearts they know that they did wrong, and most of them are sorry for it. And they know that the public knows that they did wrong, and the castigation of public ignominy has had its effect.

Now these conditions offer an opportunity for ending the prosecutions without wasting the opportunity for gathering great good to the public from them. Here is a suggestion to that end:

Have every organization that is now working for better things in San Francisco appoint a delegate to a convention that shall lay out a great plan for a better city. Have the good government clubs, the improvement clubs, the Commonwealth Club, the civic leagues, the churches, the settlements, the chamber of commerce—all—represented. Let the convention of these representatives make a list of the things San Francisco ought to do, not a list of impractical things, but a list of things that have actually been done successfully by other American or European cities. Then have the convention assign to each organization represented in it a task to occupy its energies for the next ten years. This task should be something in addition to the work now being done by each organization. And each task should be part of a coherent scheme for betterment, so that the grand result of the whole plan will be a harmonious whole.

And—here is the point—include in the grand plan a large task for Mr. Patrick Calhoun. Give him something to do with his railroads that will cost him money, something that will be of more benefit to the city than to himself, something that will tax the ingenuity of his capable mind and that will appeal to the imagination of a man of wide vision.

Then have a great public mass meeting at which the entire program shall be announced. Have speeches by men representing both sides of the present division of the citizenry. But have the principal speech by Mr. Francis J. Heney, a speech in which he should announce the end of the prosecutions and the dawn of an era of good feeling, a speech in which he would declare his conviction that the method of purifying a city by criminal prosecutions is not only a practical failure but a method mistaken in principle. There are indications that Mr. Heney is in a state of mind where that is his conviction, and that he would be willing to say so.

In other words, the whole idea of the plan is to announce the forgiveness of Mr. Calhoun by the public and the ushering in of an era in which all sides shall profit by the lessons of the past.

LEHAR'S LIFE AND NEW OPERA

The first account we have seen of the life of Franz Lehar, composer of "The Merry Widow," is from the New York Times and is as follows:

Born April 30, 1870, in the Hungarian village, Komoin, Franz Lehar inherited his talent for music from his father, who was bandmaster in the Austro-Hungarian army. He studied the violin five years at a conservatory in Prague. He received private instruction from the Bohemian composer Zdenko Fibich, and made such wonderful progress that Dvorak and even Brahms spoke very favorably about two of his sonatas which he composed when only 16 years old. In 1888 he held a position as solo violinist in Barmen-Elberfeld. The next year he went back to Vienna, joined the army, and became a member of the military band of which his father was the conductor.

Ten months later Lehar received a position as bandmaster in a small town called Losonez in Upper Hungary. There he tried for the first time to compose for the stage. From 1894 until 1896 Lehar was conductor of the marine band in Pola, and as such in April, 1894, he had the honor to concertize before William II, and there, inspired by the composer, Antonio Smareglia, he composed his opera, "Kukuska," produced for the first time in November, 1897, in Leipsic. As a composer of light opera Franz Lehar conquered the world, and has, of course, enough fame, though he did not succeed at once with his earliest operettas, "Wiener Frauen," ("Viennese Women"), "Die Juxheirath," ("Married for a Joke"), and "Der Goettergatte," ("The God's Husband").

Lehar's operetta, "Das Fuerstendind," for which Victor Leon and Leo Stein wrote the book, is to be produced for the first time in Vienna early next season. Mr. Savage has it for America.

It deals with the adventures of a Prince's daughter, who falls in love with an American visiting Athens. The noble father leads a double life. Unknown to his daughter, he is chief of a band of brigands in his idle moments, and he bitterly opposes the marriage. The father makes a specialty of capturing rich Americans visiting the mountains where his band holds sway and of holding them for ransom.

In the course of events his daughter's lover falls into his hands, and as the girl is the determined child of a desperate father, she sets out to find and free the American. Ultimately she accomplishes her object and marries the American. As the latter's wealth permits her father to live like a real Prince without resorting to hold-ups in the mountains, he resolves to abandon the latter profession and live peacefully upon the income of his son-in-law.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

After the Primary

Oh, heard ye the news of Johnson,
And heard ye the news of Kent,
How Curry and Anderson wilted,
And McKinlay went sheol-bent
And heard ye the news from the Northland,
And heard ye the news from the South?
The engine's attacked by paresis,
And Herrin looks down in the mouth.

Hurrah for the State that is Golden,
Which now of insurgency boasts!
Hurrah for her people enfranchised,
And praise to the Captain of Hosts!

There's woe in the tents of the Curry,
There's pain in the Anderson class;
There's trouble and anguish and worry—
The people have voted en masse;
The feelings of Duncan, the stalwart,
With brimstone and pepper are blent—
He wasn't so much of a walker
Compared with a runner named Kent.

Hurrah for the State that is Golden,
Which now of insurgency boasts!
Hurrah for her people enfranchised,
And praise to the Captain of Hosts!

Concerning Doing Right

It is the easiest thing in the world to do right, Rehoboam. That is, it is the easiest thing in the world to do right, with some qualifications. For instance, nothing could be easier than for you to do right, if you were in your neighbor's place. You realize this. Often, when he has done something particularly foolish, you say to yourself: "Oh, what an ass he is! If I were he I never would make such a monumental imbecile of myself. To yield to such a temptation! Why, it wouldn't tempt me at all." And probably it would not; only, how about the things that tempt you, and do not tempt him?

Then, again, it is more than easy to be good when you wake, about 'steen g. m., after an abnormally carmine evening. "Alas!" you say to yourself, "I have been dining on the husks that the swine didn't eat because I didn't give them a chance. I have gone astray and belittled myself. Such conduct stultifies the intellect and dwarfs the soul. I will have no more of it. Henceforth it is me for the straight and narrow way, till people will look at me and audibly remark, 'How good and noble he is!' How easy it is to do right. I wonder that I have hesitated so long."

Ah, how easy and comfortable you now feel, and you look with almost intolerant pity on all who wander. And the beauty of it is that you get up in the morning feeling precisely the same. You really have reformed. Isn't it beautiful? Then you go down town, and one of those pink-tinted, smiling, ingratiating temptations comes along, and—I find that I cannot write about it, my boy, for every time that I do so the many scars on my shins turn to aching wounds. But you know how it is, and so does every other man or woman who will be honest with himself or herself.

Yes, indeed, it is easy to do right—for the other fellow, Rehoboam, and it also is easy to do right in the midnight watches when you are alone with your conscience and temptation (your particular temptation) is absent; but, oh, how hard it is at other times and under other circumstances!

An Aviation Idyll

He sat in an aeroplane,
He sat,
And the wind smote his face, but he mur—
Mered, "Scat!"
And, oh, 'twas a wild and a thrilling ride,
Till a thingumbob slipped that shouldn't slide,
And they gathered his fragments from far and wide—How's that?

The Opinions of Rufus

Any man ought to know himself well 'nough to realize that the feller that allers agrees with him must be consider'ble of a dern fool.

I should s'pose that every time the Almighty sees a woman in a waste basket hat an' a hobble skirt He must be a good deal discouraged 'bout ever makin' anything out of the race.

The poet said, "Let us, then, be up an' doin'," but lots of us would have thought more of his poetry if he'd mentioned who.

Josh Bings trained his daughter fer a Society woman; said she wan't either han'som or usef'ul, an' he felt it his duty to do somethin' with her.

Haste makes waste, es the fat woman said when she objected to bein' hurried to ketch the train.

Good clothes may make a man feel more respectable, but it's generly admitted that they don't improve his character much.

When Hi Pennick told his wife she couldn't have a fireless cooker she said he ought to be grateful that he prob'ly wus goin' where one wouldn't be needed. I reckon that wus a hot one on Hi.

'Bout the best thing some parents could do fer their child would be to pervail on him to do es they don't an' don't es they do.

Don't brag 'bout your "permanent position." Remember that the only reely permanent position in this world is in a coffin.

I've seen a good many things in my time, son, but never yit a marriage that wus a failure when both parties to it wus determined it shouldn't be.

Anyway an' always, es I see it, marriage would be a glorified success if 'twas in some way so 'ranged that no human bein's wus mixed up with it.

Philosophy is the science that tells you everything 'bout anything—'cept where you come frum an' where you're goin', an' if you consider them matters of no 'count prob'ly you'll think philosophy's jest beautiful.

I know some men I'd trust with my pocket-book lots quicker than I would with a vote. You see, there's imprisonment for stealin', but not fer votin' iniquity.

A Little Surgical Paean

(Tenderly addressed to whatever is left of dear Susie at this writing.)

Her vermiform appendix they Cut out, and, just to do it right,
They then, in quite a casual way,
Removed most everything in sight.

Refrain

(In a minor, broken by fitful but determined sobs, which must be imagined.)

I love her, oh, I love her!
Whatever they may do,
I'm bound to love my Susie dear
The lifelong journey through.

Her lungs or liver—I know not
What next served peace to rout,
But, ah, I know, and sadly know,
The doctors cut it out!

Refrain

(As before, only more so.)

I love her, oh, I love her!
They cannot quench the flame.
Although she's scattered round somewhat,
I love her just the same.

I think it was her larynx
That was the next to go,
Although it may—it matters not;
They cut it out, I know.

Refrain

(Pull out the tremolo stop.)

I love her, oh, I love her!
She yet may disappear,
But while one fragment comes my way
I'll love my Susie dear.

The Fly Philosopher and the Sawmill

A colony of flies which had settled in a sawmill became deeply interested in the mechanical operations about them. These they could not comprehend, and, being intelligent flies, they desired to do. So they called a certain grave and profound Fly Philosopher to instruct them.

"What is it that makes the saw go?" they inquired.

"Why, it is attached to this cylinder," the Fly Philosopher responded, "and as the cylinder revolves, necessarily the saw must."

"Yes, but what makes the cylinder revolve?" they inquired further.

"It is connected with this belt, and as the belt revolves, so must the cylinder," he replied.

"But what makes the belt revolve?" they still queried.

"It is connected with a shaft which turns, and consequently the belt does the same."

"But why does the shaft turn?"

"It is connected with this large thingumbob, which turns it."

"Yes, we see," the inquiring flies responded, "but what is the power in the large thingumbob that turns the shaft, and how does it do it?"

The Fly Philosopher put on another pair of spectacles, so as to see his questioners better, and gravely responded:

"My friends," he said, "you must recognize that there are profundities and mysteries of nature never yet sounded in fly philosophy. In your questioning you have reached one of those depths, one of those dark profundities over which are written the fateful words, 'Thus far, and no farther,' but you may console yourself by the reflection that after you have absorbed all I have told you, you will be wise and learned, as I am."

So the fly convention, being eminently satisfied, adjourned.

Moral: In fly philosophy and human philosophy there is a "thus far, and no farther," and fly philosophers and human philosophers alike entertain with explanation of small why and petty how until they face the vast, eternal Why and How, and then they are heard no more.

It Is Like This, Son

You may sow wild oats, but you won't get much of a crop of potatoes or barley from the seed.

You may save a sinner, but you will not do it by walking away from him and scowling.

There is one sinner that any of us can save, and he wears our clothes.

It is well to be righteous, but don't make the mistake of thinking that it and self-righteousness are the same thing.

Don't imagine that the dear girl is perfect. If she were, do you suppose she would have you hanging around evenings?

We are half what our fathers and mothers make us, but never forget that we have the privilege of building the other half for ourselves.

Of course you can "drink or let it alone," but did you ever notice that men who are that way almost always conclude to drink?

Sweetsie Won a Prize

Fond Mama—Our dear little Sweetsie won a prize in the baby show.

Interested Friend—Wasn't that perfectly lovely! She won it as the handsomest child, I suppose?

"Er—well, you know, there were several different prizes, and—"

"I'll bet she won it as the brightest baby,"

"No, I can't say that she really did, but—"

"For what was she given the prize, then?"

"Why, she—I—well, if you must know, it was as the homeliest kid in the bunch."

"What a perfectly cute little dear she is, isn't she?"

"Yes, ain't she though!"

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Something Working In the Taft Mind

No one knows how much credence to place in reports from Beverly. The President's summer home is beset with reporters as hungry as wolves for any scraps of news that may be thrown to them. Under such conditions the temptation to make a "story" out of little is great, and yet woe to the reporter who is caught at it! He will get not a scrap more. Therefore, we have a right to conclude that persistent rumors from that domicile have at least a foundation in fact, and such rumors are persistently to the effect that there is something working in the Taft mind. The President appears to have become persuaded that, whether or not he has made a bad choice of advisers, the American people are convinced that he has, and seems inclined to defer to their views to the extent of some changes. In other words, he is showing signs of weakening on his standpat affiliations. He will let Ballinger go from his cabinet and Aldrich and Hale from his councils. Cannon will be dropped like the hot old potato that he is. William Howard Taft is the great American placater and if he can take the "curse" off the Republican handicap, and so save the House to the party, by paying heed to progressive public sentiment, he is not unlikely to sacrifice a few pieces from the political chessboard to that end. The more especially if those to be sacrificed are dead ones already or have signified their intention to remove themselves from public life.

Will Murray Crane Be Senator Better Than Aldrich?

Winthrop Murray Crane is said to be the chief fugleman in these maneuvers. He is no gumshoe man. The pad-pad-pad of a gumshoe would be a disorderly racket by comparison with the movements of Murray Crane. He flits. He is as noiseless as a shadow falling athwart a path. He compels nothing. Aldrich applied the cinch and no amount of kicking and squealing on the part of the cinched elicited so much as a "poor fellow!" out of Aldrich. He went on with his cinching until he had his victims safely straightjacketed and willing to suffer in unprotesting silence. Nature made Murray Crane winsome and he wins. He so fixes things that the logic of the situation becomes compelling. But how much better off shall we be with Murray Crane than with Nelson Aldrich at the President's elbow? Murray Crane is no progressive. His only redeeming trait is that he has the faculty of sensing public sentiment, and has not, like Aldrich, the hardihood to defy it. But the sympathies of Winthrop Murray Crane are not with the progressive element. He will not work for it or with it and will circumvent it if he can. He is a good man to fix things political for the President, but a very unsatisfactory man to fix things economic for the public good. If the President really wishes to put himself in accord with progressive Republican sentiment, he will select someone other than Murray Crane to be his interpreter of that sentiment.

An Apostle of Contentment

If John Temple Graves tells the truth about Judson Harmon then the latter will not be the man to lead a forlorn hope for the Democratic party two years hence. Unless all the signs and omens are propitious for success he, the said Harmon, will offer himself as no living sacrifice. He will preserve his serenity of mind and take lessons in contentment in the comparative security of the buckeye state. That is not the type of man the Democratic party needs. Better Bryan a fourth time than that, for, to the credit of Mr. Bryan be it said, he did not hang back until the chance to win looked good to him before he offered to stand in the breach. A chance to fight was all he asked and all he got and twice, at least, it wasn't a very good chance either.

Another expression from the mouth of Judson Harmon was almost equally unfortunate, always provided that John Temple Graves reported him correctly: It was that historic and traditional Democratic policies have been vindicated by the mistakes of the Republicans. This country is not going to return to any historic and traditional Democracy. There is to be no about-face that the hosts of free government may march backward. There are no steps to retrace. The fault the American people find with the Republican party is that it has been marking time instead of moving toward a fuller participation of the people in their own government. If the Republican party is to be withstood it can only be by a Democratic party that will move forward faster, and take more advanced ground than the Republican party dare. That interview granted to John Temple Graves appears to have been a characteristic Democratic blunder.

Adieu Alden Anderson During the campaign Mr. Alden Anderson ventured the opinion that the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company is a myth. Now he is probably convinced of it. His campaign has turned out about as a campaign managed by a good sized myth might be expected to turn out. Of course that "myth" spent a barrel of money, probably its own, and it so took the bits into its own teeth that Mr. Anderson had nothing to do or say about what was done or attempted no matter whether he pushed on the lines or pulled on them. Of all the candidates the plight of Anderson is the worst. He had much to lose and he gained nothing. He was practically loaned by the governor to the "myth" for the occasion, to be returned to the superintendency of the banks when the "myth" had used him up. Adieu from political life, Alden Anderson! No finer gentleman was ever more outrageously undone.

His Record Undid Him The case of Harry Pulcifer should be a warning to two kinds of people, to those who make records and to those who should make records known. It was Hichborn's "Story of the California Legislature" that defeated Pulcifer. There was no getting away from that record. And this was no injustice to Pulcifer. No man has any right to quarrel with his own record. Nothing spoke against Pulcifer but his record. It was the only objection to him. What Hichborn's history did in that district it has done in many others. That history has proven a losing proposition to its author. It has proven a mighty profitable proposition to the State of California. Some plan should be devised for a like history of each legislative session. Who will see to it?

San Francisco's Legislative Vote

San Francisco declined several opportunities to improve its legislative delegation. The sorriest break of this kind that it made was the defeat of E. J. Callan in the 22nd senatorial district. Here was an opportunity to promote from the assembly a man with a perfect record who has repeatedly proven his usefulness to the state. Callan's defeat is a misfortune to the whole state. It is directly attributable to the interjection of Edwin T. McMurray's name into the list of candidates by McMurray, in the face of warnings that McMurray's personal ambitions at this time would endanger the success of Callan, in whose principles McMurray professes to coincide. McMurray's votes were drawn from Callan's natural strength, and half of them would have given Callan the nomination over John J. Cassidy. The defeat of Callan may therefore justly be laid at McMurray's door, and The Watchman feels that McMurray merits the condemnation of the state for it.

In the 20th district, John W. Sweeney was defeated by a large vote. The nominee is Edward F. Bryant, whose political affiliations promise no improvement in the San Francisco delegation.

In the 24th, Marc Anthony went down to defeat at the hands of Dominick Beban. This is another bad trade.

In the assembly districts there are two or three encouragements and many discouragements. In the 35th Fred Gerdes, who deserved renomination, got it by a handsome vote, and will doubtless be returned to the legislature where he made good last year. J. E. White, in the 39th, wins, but by a beggarly majority of 16 votes in a district that boasts itself the cleanest in the city. He should have received hundreds majority. In the 35th, Fred Heim should have been chosen. He lost by a large majority. In the 41st, Abraham Perry Harris was defeated by Nat Coghlan, but it is encouraging to note that he made a good race. In the 42nd, Arthur Joel won, which is encouraging. In the 30th, Archie McAllister lost out. In the 36th, Henry N. Beatty won, as his record entitled him to do.

On the whole, the San Francisco delegation will run about the same as to quality as it did last year. The general result is an indication that the city is largely impervious to moral impulses that move the rest of the state toward better things.

Congratulations To Macarthur

Walter Macarthur the Man defeated R. E. Troy the Democrat by a handsome majority for the Democratic nomination for congressman from the Fourth district. The Watchman congratulates Macarthur and his district. It is good to know that sometimes voters put manhood and a forward vision before the golden calf of party regularity. Macarthur is as good a Democrat as there is in California, but that is the least of his qualifications. He is able, he is honest, and he knows what needs to be done.

Santa Clara Legislators

Marshall Black is nominated for re-election to the senate from the 28th district. It was a close fight, but Black won. This is good. He made an admirable record last year, and will go back to be a power for progress next time. In the 56th assembly district, L. D. Bohnett won by a large majority. This also is good. His record was perfect, and he gave proof of the possession of great executive ability in addition to absolute integrity and great ac-men. In the 56th, our information is that Robert L. Telfer is having a close call for renomination, with the result still in doubt. If he wins out, as he should, Santa Clara county is to be congratulated upon sending back the men who have demonstrated their character and ability.

Great Credit Due To Charles R. Detrick, Charles R. Detrick

secretary of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, was also a candidate for the Republican nomination for assemblyman from the 57th district, Santa Clara county, against David R. Hayes, incumbent. Detrick knows the game of politics, has repeatedly won elections for other men in his district, and could undoubtedly have won this nomination but for one thing. This one thing was the fact that his sense of duty was so strong and his loyalty to Johnson so great that he would not leave his office at League headquarters even for one day to make his own canvass. He was defeated probably by only 52 votes. He could have won, but saw his own nomination slipping from him while he stayed by the ship. For this genuine sacrifice of his own immediate future, Detrick cannot be too highly praised. And right here it should be added that he developed a really remarkable executive ability during the campaign. In the midst of excitement, disputes, doubts and perplexities, Detrick preserved an admirable balance, and with quiet but decisive judgment steered matters into calm and effective channels. To no man actively in charge of the campaign north of Tehachapi is more credit due than to Detrick for the results achieved. He comes out of the campaign with the highest admiration of as experienced a politician as William Kent, for instance, and with a reputation for ability among all those who watched his work that places him among the most effective instruments for reform in California. Keep an eye on Charles R. Detrick. He is in line for big things in this state.

League Captures the State Republican Organization

One surprising and happy result of the election was the capture of the Republican state organization by the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. In the excitement over the election or defeat of candidates, the newspapers and the public generally have overlooked the matter of delegates to the county conventions, so that it is not generally known that the League elected an overwhelming majority of its delegates in San Francisco and in Santa Clara county, and that the indications are that the same result has been achieved in Alameda, Los Angeles and Fresno counties, in fact, probably in every large county of the state. The results of these facts are of tremendous and far-reaching importance. They mean that there is no longer a Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, for the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League is now the Republican party in California. They mean that when the state convention of the Republican party convenes in San Francisco on September 6th, the majority will consist of the delegates elected by the League, and that this majority can veto the action of the present machine state executive committee in the selection of temporary and permanent chairman of the convention. As the chairman appoints the committees and the committees bring in the reports that result in the organization of the convention and in the personnel of the state central committee, this means that the next state central committee will be progressive, the next executive committee of the state central committee will be progressive, and that the party machinery and organization will be entirely in the hands of progressives. This means the crushing of the Southern Pacific political machine's grip on the Republican party in California. All these results are clearly in the power of the reform element. They can do these things. Now intelligent leadership must see to it that they do do these things. Then the last snarl of the old machine gang about "insurgents," "party wreckers" and like gibes will be spiked forever. Insurgency is regular Republicanism henceforth in California.

William Kent The Wonder

Just look at it! William Kent went into the second congressional district practically unknown except by name. Not one voter in a thousand in that district had ever seen him. He is no spell-binder as an orator. He did not begin his campaign until late, months after Hiram Johnson began his. He went up against the administration pet of the California delegation. He went up against an orator with a national reputation, against the united brotherhood of postmasters, against all that Ballinger and Wickersham, winked at by the President, could do against him in the most adroit manner possible; but he went at them hammer and tongs. He met the people face to face. He told them the truth. He made them no promises that he will not fulfill, told them plainly that he would do what was right rather than subserve any selfish special interests they might have, talked plain common sense to common sense people, those that he could not see he wrote to and the more he talked the better the people liked him. Five minutes' talk with William Kent will make any open minded man William Kent's friend, just because he is frank and honest, so frank and honest that the voters took him on sight and at his word. His district was not as large as that of Hiram Johnson, and his personality is not just the same sort, although every whit as engaging, but, in proportion to the size of the district the Kent campaign was anyhow next, if not equal to, that of Johnson. For McKinlay was and is no weakling. He knows how to give and take blows man fashion, and yet he went down to defeat before Kent. It really was a wonder!

THE CHIEF MOURNER

Many Precincts Not Heard From

At the hour of going to press (Thursday at 3 p. m.) not all the precincts in the state have been heard from. Therefore The Watchman cannot tell of a certainty how the contest has fared with all the men on the progressive ticket, but at this hour it seems likely that the entire Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League ticket will pull through with the exception of Allison Ware for Superintendent of Public Instruction. Mr. Hyatt has not been going about the state for his health alone for the last three and a half years. He was not opposed because he was thought to be a bad man for the place, but because it was believed that Allison Ware would be a better. Another week will have reduced the whole incident to history, and very instructive history at that. Eshleman carries every county in his district.

In the Case of Frank Leavitt

Let not young Mr. Tyrrell take the flattering unctious to his soul that he beat Frank Leavitt for the senatorial nomination in the sixteenth senatorial district. He never touched him. Frank Leavitt beat himself. It is written in the book of fate that no man can continuously misuse splendid abilities without being brought to book for it. Leavitt tried to. He had his day. He got to his rope's end. A cigar store Indian could have beaten him just as well. Right thinking men simply would not vote for him any more. All the same The Watchman hopes that young Mr. Tyrrell will keep his head, improve his opportunity and try to be right rather than smart. That is the besetting sin of young legislators. The opportunity of a lifetime is his. May he make the most of it.

Congratulations Are Now In Order

Many "organization" men made haste to extend congratulations to Hiram Johnson and pledge him their support. In this no one was more prompt or cordial than Governor James N. Gillett. The Watchman believes the Governor to be sincere in this. He is a party man. His political future lies with the party. He was a "long-hair" before he was an "organization" man and he can be a "long-hair" again if the logic of the situation compels it without more embarrassment than he experienced in making the first change of political raiment. The Watchman counts on the Governor doing good, loyal work for the success of the new Republicanism. And oh! how good it will seem to him to be free once more.

The same may be said of Mr. Charles Forrest Curry. He is a Republican. What kind of Republican he is called upon to be is wholly immaterial to him. Any kind is good just so it is Republican. His political future, if he has any, and he probably has, is in the Republican party. His case is different from that of Leavitt, and yet not so different. He is a man of exceptional ability. The same qualities of personality that bound the bar-keeps to him so that the breweries could not tear them asunder, had he lifted up his eyes and his political morals, would have bound to him as firmly the very best in this state. Only one thing he lacked, and that was a high moral purpose, to have made him instead of Hiram Johnson, the deliverer of the state and that long years ago while Johnson was a boy. He will work for Johnson and that work will count for Johnson. Other men have done the proper caper, some in sincerity, and some because it was good form. But these two at least have spoken with sincerity of purpose.

Splendid Work In Los Angeles

Splendid work for a free state was done by the Lincoln-Roosevelt forces in Los Angeles. Those men early got together and stood together, with the result that they will send to Sacramento next winter a solid delegation of free and independent legislators. McCartney, Savage, Leeds, all have gone down to a deserved defeat. There organization was met with organization, not organized on the same lines, to be sure, but organized none the less thoroughly for that. The old organization was held together by the cohesive power of patronage, the new by pouring out money and effort for the good of state, county and city, asking nothing in return but a chance to boost for Right Things in government. No compromises were attempted. The fight was clean cut and the victory is unquestioned. Great glory to the Men of the South! They couple a fine moral enthusiasm with splendid common sense reinforced by indefatigable industry. There are those who prate of organization being a sin and contrary to the spirit of the direct primary. Those who

THE PEPPER TREE By Lannie Haynes Martin (For The California Weekly)

Filmy, floating, filigree,
Sun-spun, is thy drapery,
Fairy-fruited pepper tree!
With thy red-bead rosary—
Scarlet thread of memory—
Thou dost bring again to me
Magic tales of Araby.

In the Genie's garden growing
There such trees with rubies glowing;
Such, with emerald fringes flowing;
Such, their potent charm bestowing;
Nature's hidden secrets showing;
When Aladdin thither going
Found the wonder-lamp of Joy!

Sybil, singing pepper tree,
Wind-tuned harp of greenery,
With aeolian minstrelsy
Blending song of bird and bee—
Blending all life's ecstasy—
With thy vocal rhapsody,
Till adrift I seem to be
On thy liquid melody,
Heart's content my lone convoy.

BERNHARDT'S LAWSUITS

A new phase of Sarah Bernhardt's character is revealed in the following account from the Springfield Republican:

Henry Bataille, author of "The Foolish Virgin," is known in Paris as the man of many lawsuits. He is an able man, a clever man, a successful man, and one with whom it is dangerous to fool. His most recent litigation was with Sarah Bernhardt over his version of "Faust," which she accepted and announced, and even began to work on, and then abandoned, declaring that the piece was impossible.
They went to law. The decision of the first trial condemned each party to pay the expense incurred. Bataille appealed, and the second verdict condemned Bernhardt to pay Bataille damages to the amount of $4000.

This is not a large sum, but it would embarrass Mme. Bernhardt to hand it over all the same. Besides, she has been used to things of that sort all her life. Never since she left the Theatre Francaise has she been free from judgments. When it is the case of an author she does not put herself out much.
In the case of Bataille she did not put herself out at all. She simply left Paris to go on tour, leaving the company of her son playing a new failure by that hero of so many, Emile Bergerat, which a few days later was withdrawn for the inevitable "Dame aux Camellias." But the dramatist is not a man to take liberties with. Suddenly the Theatre Sarah Bernhardt was closed. All the advertisements of the theatre had a band pasted across them, on which were the words, "Closed owing to the illness of a member of the company."

It did not take long, however, for the truth to reach the boulevards, when it was known that Bataille had legally seized the box office receipts, and, Bernhardt being absent, her manager at once closed the house until she could be heard from. In twenty-four hours the matter was adjusted by the actress agreeing to pay the author 4000 francs ($800) a month until the debt was settled. Then the theatre reopened, and Bataille wrote a letter to the press explaining that it had never been his intention, in putting an execution on the house and the theatre of Mme. Bernhardt, to do more than use that method to let her know that he was in earnest, and proposed that this time she should settle a just debt. He announced that every penny of the money should be used to further the interests of young authors in Paris.

The first 4000 francs is to be given as a prize for a play, the decision to be in the hands of a properly appointed jury. The second 4000 francs is to go to aid a young author in getting his play staged, and so on. The letter is clever, and ends in asserting that he is sure that Mme. Bernhardt, who has in her time done so much for young authors, will not so much mind paying up when she knows that none of the money will go to him, but will serve a good purpose.

THE STORY OF THE WESTERN PACIFIC

CALIFORNIA'S NEW TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILROAD

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

Under the autocratic railroad regime of the late E. H. Harriman, many of the old independent railroad systems felt the weight of his power. Stuyvesant Fish, the benevolent despot of the Illinois Central, was ousted from control and the road placed in the Harriman group under the presidency of Harahan, a Harriman satellite. Even James J. Hill, grim old warrior of the north, had the fight of his life to preserve the integrity of his freight territory, and only saved his pre-eminence in the Northwest through concessions that threatened, had Harriman lived, to end his supremacy.

Gould's Dash to Tidewater

In this war of the railroad giants, George Gould strove mightily to preserve his lines intact. But he was in a weak strategical position. A large part of his resources had gone to accomplish his gigantic feat of putting the Wabash into Pittsburg over the veto of Carnegie and the Pennsylvania Railroad, and in the attempt—which is still not quite successful—to reach the Atlantic seaboard. In the interior, he was beset on all sides. His Denver and Rio Grande system, it is true, connected eastward at Pueblo with his Missouri Pacific to St. Louis, and his Missouri Pacific connected, still eastward, with his Wabash to Chicago and thence east as far as Detroit and Pittsburg. These roads all tapped rich territory and gathered much freight, but they stopped short of tidewater both east and west. And this fact left them at the mercy of connecting roads on transcontinental business. The great Eastern systems bled the Gould lines from Detroit and Pittsburg for the final haul to tidewater, and the Harriman lines in the West bled them for the haul from Salt Lake City to the Pacific Ocean.

It was in the struggle to break from these sources of drainage of profits that Gould made his dash for Pittsburg with the Wabash, intending to go on to tidewater, presumably at Baltimore. But the financial stringency of 1906 and 1907 caught him in bad shape, and forced him to terms with Harriman and the Pennsylvania that held up the continuation of the Wabash to Atlantic waters.

But the Western Pacific was not entangled in these financial difficulties, and now that Harriman is dead and the money market is easier, the labor of getting a Pacific connection for the Denver & Rio Grande has been completed, and the name of that achievement is the Western Pacific Railway, which will run its first passenger trains between San Francisco and Salt Lake City next Monday, August 22, 1910.

An Epochal Event For California

The advent of the Western Pacific should make an epoch in the history of California. It is the advent of a new railroad, under independent management, and under no obligations to the Harriman system. The Santa Fe has never had an opportunity to compete with the Southern Pacific in California, because it had to make terms with the Southern Pacific to get into upper California over the Tehachapi Pass, where it had to use ninety miles of the Southern Pacific tracks. Furthermore, the Harriman group of capitalists owned so heavily in Santa Fe stock that Harriman was always able to exercise a considerable influence in its councils, at least sufficient to prevent any radical competition on its part.

But the Western Pacific has no such handicap in its freedom to compete with the Central Pacific. It has had to ask no favor of the Central Pacific, and its engineers have achieved certain signal advantages over that road. The most decisive of these are in the matters of grade and snow.

Engineering Feats of Western Pacific

It is difficult to make clear to the lay mind the tremendous importance of seemingly very slight differences in the percentage of grades on a railroad. For instance, the highest percentage of grade on the Central Pacific is probably a trifle over 3 per cent—that is, a rise of three feet to every hundred feet of track. And from an engineering point of view it is considered that the Western Pacific engineers performed a tremendous feat in getting over the Sierra Nevada mountains with no grade greater than 1 per cent. But if the reader has ever traveled over the Santa Fe and remembers going up the grade, west-bound, from Trinidad to Raton Pass, he will recall that an ordinary passenger train required two engines in front and one behind, and that the train ascended no faster than a horse could walk. That was a 3 per cent grade. When you figure that the bulk of railroad traffic—and the profitable part of it—is freight traffic, and consider the difference in annual cost of running freight trains over frequent stretches of 3 per cent grade and in running them over a line that has no grade above 1 per cent—in practice a tremendously less difficult grade—you will perceive the importance of this matter of grades in the ability to compete for freight, both on the basis of lower charges and of faster schedule time. As a matter of demonstration, tried out with an actual train, the Western Pacific has proved that it can put freight into Chicago, from California, almost as quickly as the Central Pacific now puts passengers there. And, as much of California's freight is fruit, the matter of time is of vital importance.

Another achievement of the Western Pacific is that it has got over the Sierra range at a maximum elevation 2,000 feet lower than the Central Pacific. The Central Pacific has always had trouble with its Truckee division, where the snow is so bad that the track has to be covered with wooden sheds for forty miles. In winter there are constant delays, owing to breaks in these sheds, caused by the terrific pressure of snow piling down upon them and crushing them in, thus blocking the tracks. The elevation of Summit, the highest point on the Central Pacific in the Sierra Nevada, is more than 7,000 feet. The highest corresponding point on the Western Pacific is at Beckwourth Tunnel, where the elevation is only 5,100 feet. Of course, this is not below the snow line, but it is probable that it is low enough so that the problem of keeping the track clear of snow will not be any more difficult than in many stretches of all the other roads, which means that it will be much less difficult than the same problem on the Central Pacific.

Route of the Western Pacific

The route of the Western Pacific from Oakland to Stockton is by way of Niles, getting over the Altamont range through the Livermore valley route. From Stockton to Sacramento the Western Pacific parallels the Southern Pacific, and from Sacramento to Marysville and Oroville it still parallels the Southern Pacific, but not the through line, or Central Pacific, which cuts more nearly due east to Truckee and Reno. The Western Pacific here runs much farther north, seeking the lower crossing of the range at Beckwourth Tunnel, and to do this it follows up the North and Middle Forks of the Feather River and enters Nevada about sixty miles north of Reno. The Western Pacific then gradually approaches the Central Pacific, at length meeting it at Winnemucca. From Winnemucca east to Wells, a distance of 185 miles, the two roads are nearly always within sight of each other and, in some places, on practically the same roadbed. From Wells the Central Pacific runs directly in the direction of Ogden, while the Western Pacific runs directly to Salt Lake City. As Ogden is forty miles due north of Salt Lake City, the Central Pacific cuts directly across Great Salt Lake by way of the famous Lucin cut-off, while the Western Pacific skirts the southern shore of Great Salt Lake, coming in directly to that city, which is at the southeast corner of the lake. The Union Pacific ends at Ogden, and any traffic it sends by way of Salt Lake City must make the extra run of forty miles over the tracks of the Rio Grande Western.

Length of the Line

In spite of this advantage, the Western Pacific is the longer route from San Francisco to Salt Lake. This is due to the necessity for it to reach Sacramento by the long detour of the bay by way of Stockton, while the Southern Pacific has a cut-off from Sacramento across the marshes to Benicia, thence ferrying across the Straits of Carquinez to Port Costa and coming into Oakland by the shore line. Thus by the Southern Pacific the distance from Oakland to Sacramento is only 86 miles, while by the Western Pacific it is 139 miles. This advantage applies principally to passenger traffic, as all freight traffic goes by the Niles route to save the ferry at Port Costa, and the Southern Pacific route via Niles is practically the same as the Western Pacific route.

From San Francisco to Salt Lake City the Central Pacific route is 98 miles shorter than the Western Pacific, the distance being, via the Western Pacific, 921 miles; via the Central Pacific, 823 miles. But on freight traffic this advantage is more than discounted in favor of the Western Pacific by reason of its easier grades.

Passenger Service

Of course, in passenger traffic, the Central Pacific will probably long be able to make better time, unless the Western Pacific builds a cut-off from San Francisco to Sacramento, in which case it would be shorter than the Central Pacific, as well as much easier to climb. On the basis of present time-tables the difference in passenger time is as follows, though, of course, such a comparison is obviously unfair, considering the fact that the Western Pacific will run only one through passenger train each way daily and has not yet proved what it can do: the time announced by the Western Pacific from San Francisco to Salt Lake City is 38 hours; the time of the Overland Limited on the Central Pacific is 27½ hours to Ogden, the corresponding point on an eastbound transcontinental trip.

Wonderful Scenic Attractions

But for passenger traffic of which time is not the essence, the Western Pacific route offers much more beautiful scenic attractions. Its route through the canyons of the California side of the Sierra Nevada is said to equal in majesty and wild grandeur the famous Royal Gorge, and to be unequaled on any other railroad line in the United States. Thus the eastbound traveler on the Gould system will travel through this new and magnificent scenery on his way to Salt Lake City, he will skirt the Great Salt Lake, and, east of the city, will travel on the Denver & Rio Grande through the Royal Gorge and the Canyon of the Grande to Pueblo. There connections are made both with the Missouri Pacific to Kansas City and St. Louis, and with the Burlington to Chicago. From Chicago the route is by way of the Wabash to Detroit or to Pittsburg. For freight purposes, or for passenger traffic that cares to go that way, the route from Pueblo can be via the Missouri Pacific to St. Louis and thence via the Wabash to Chicago.

Sources of Freight Traffic

The resources of freight traffic for the new road are tremendous. The Gould lines of the Middle West, including the Wabash, the Missouri Pacific and the Iron Mountain, gather freight from the richest developed section of the country. All freight for Oriental shipment originating in this vast territory, extending from Detroit and Pittsburg on the east to Denver on the west, and from Chicago and St. Louis on the north to Southern Texas on the south, can be routed over the Denver & Rio Grande and the Western Pacific to tidewater at San Francisco. At San Francisco the Western Pacific has perfected an arrangement with the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, the great Japanese steamship company, to handle its Oriental traffic. One of the two present terminals of the Western Pacific in San Francisco is Pier 34, which is also the berth of the vessels of the Japanese line.

Another great freight resource of the Western Pacific will be eastern freight originated by the Hill system, especially by the Burlington, and destined for San Francisco. The Hill lines would naturally prefer to transfer freight from the Burlington to a Gould line rather than to a Harriman line.

In California itself, the Western Pacific has already captured a good share of the fruit traffic originating in the Sacramento valley. The freight service has been in operation since last spring, and for some weeks the Western Pacific has run out a daily fruit special train from Oroville to the East. In the course of time, the Western Pacific will naturally build branch line feeders to other centers of freight traffic in the state. Such lines would naturally tap the San Joaquin valley, the upper Sacramento valley, and the fruit districts of Santa Clara.

Oakland and San Francisco Terminals

The Oakland terminal of the Western Pacific is an 11,000-foot mole running out into the bay midway between the Southern Pacific mole and the Alameda mole. The passenger ferries from this Oakland terminal will run to the Ferry Building at the foot of Market street. The freight terminals on the San Francisco side are at Piers 34 and 36, at the foot of Brannan street, connecting with a small yard, and a second terminal at the foot of Twenty-fifth street (near Islais Creek Basin) from which there is a rail connection with a yard at Ninth and Bryant streets. In the course of time there will also be a third terminal in the North Beach district, at the foot of Chestnut street.

Time of Building

The first work done on the construction of the Western Pacific in California was in Marysville, near the site of the present station, on September 11, 1905. The work in Utah was begun somewhat earlier. The last spike was driven, connecting the last gap in the complete line of rails from San Francisco to Salt Lake City, at Spanish Creek, in Northern California, on October 30, 1909. In those four years, 921 miles of track were laid, 29 steel bridges were built, 43 tunnels (aggregating 8½ miles in length) were driven, and the great terminal works at Oakland and San Francisco practically completed.

Some remarkable engineering problems were solved. Some of the surveys in the Feather River country were made by men suspended by ropes over the edge of precipices. In one place the course of a stream had to be turned to allow space for the roadbed. In another, the narrow ledge of rock on the face of a steep cliff had to be bolstered up with huge masonry walls. To get over the summit of the range at Beckwourth Pass, a tunnel 6006 feet long (1.14 miles) was driven. The road is also noteworthy for the excellence of its first construction. The rails are heavy and the roadbed is rock ballasted throughout. The credit for the engineering feats performed in the discovery of the route and the construction of the road is due to Virgil Bogue, the engineer.

The Western Pacific is remarkable in other respects, especially by contrast with the Central Pacific. It was built absolutely without government or local bonuses of either money or land, the only exceptions to this statement being in a few cases where individual property owners voluntarily donated the right of way through their land. The Western Pacific was built wholly by private capital. And it is especially noteworthy that the Western Pacific has been built without any accompanying scandal either of finance or of politics. This is peculiarly refreshing to California.

Altogether, California has reason to be glad of the advent of the Western Pacific into California. A new transcontinental railroad connection, under management independent of the generation-old domination of the Southern and Central Pacific; the hope of freight competition; a new promise of supremacy in the Oriental trade; a strong stimulation of local industry; and the example of a railroad that believes in staying out of politics. These things are more than novel, spurring to the imagination though they are. They are significant of a dawning era of profound import to California, both economically and politically, and full of suggestion of the greater destiny that looms before this state.

talked that way were either babbling political idiots or they wished the forces of civic righteousness to remain a mob that the organized, paid and disciplined forces of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific might handle them as a disciplined soldiery would handle a mob—send them scattering at a single volley. Without organization nothing. With it everything, but all depends on what kind of organization it is, whether for good or for evil, of volunteers or of hirelings, for good government or for plunder.

Los Angeles vs. The Alameda Way

There are good men in politics in Alameda county, but their method is not that of Los Angeles and neither are their results. They asked that the welfare of the Lincoln-Roosevelt state ticket be placed in their hands without organizing the League forces separately, promising to see the ticket through in good shape. They kept the faith. But they wanted a clear field for clearing some objectionable men out of the court-house. This JACK KILLMILLAN lay at ease on the counter of the commissary of Camp 5, biting at the end of an unlit cigar and looking out the low door to the sidehill across the gulch, where the crosscut sawyers were following the timber fellers up the slope. Jack Killmillan was the boss of the woods. That means that he had at his command some three hundred lumberjacks, and that, again, means that he was all man. Bossing three hundred woodsmen is not the work for a boy or a chicken-heart. Jack Killmillan had worked his way to the top, by gigantic strength and tireless energy and a fearless ferocity when aroused.

But as he lay on the counter, with his limbs relaxed, he was a pleasant sight to look upon. Under the rough, loose shirt, the rolls of muscle rose and fell with the slightest movement. He did not look the giant, for all his six feet two, for he was not broad, only splendidly proportioned and suggesting rather the tiger than the bear. He wore overalls and heavy shoes, and beside him lay his buckskin gauntlets, for the big black horse tied to a stump outside was one of three that he made earn a living as he rode his forty or fifty miles a day from gang to gang over the mountain. Jack's eyes were gray, and often full of fire, but now pacific as they could be. Only the restless rippling of the muscles and the fierce curve of the great mustache suggested the "wild man," as the lumberjacks often called him.

But a tremendous energy and resolution smouldered constantly, roused easily into swift and terrific action. There were not a half dozen men in camp who did not fear him, and not one who knew him well that did not like him. A hard driver, violent and unbelievably profane, he had yet a quick sympathy and an understanding of trouble, and a rough sense of justice that made men feel that he would give them a fair shake, as they called it.

Suddenly the smouldering fire flamed up. Across the gulch he had noted a sawyer using one hand instead of two at the end of the long crosscut saw. Jack sprung from the counter and made for the door, ending an explosion of profanity with the self-addressed query, "If the Eternal meant for a man to use only one hand to work with, why did he give him two?" when he was interrupted by someone blocking the door. He stammered, turned red all over, and backed away from the apparition as from a ghost. It was a girl.

Now why the appearance of a girl should have so disconcerted the boss of the woods must be made plain. In the first place, the crudest lumberjack has an innate reverence for all good women—as most simple men have—and an innate spirit of courtesy that regards a woman's feelings to the utmost. Not a man on the hill but would rather have bit his tongue in two than knowingly to have sworn before a woman. To this feeling Jack added a positive terror of all womenkind. The oldest lumberjack could not recall having even seen him speak to a woman, and many of them could remember seeing him detour a mile on foot to avoid having to do it.

His confusion in this case was pitiable. To see six feet of really tremendous manhood staggering backward from the presence of a pale slip of a girl was one of those humors of the gods that make the world so perennially a source of interest. Plainly he thought of flight, but that was barred by the counter from which he had just descended. The only exit was the doorway, and this the girl continued to occupy, a good deal bewildered at Jack's expression. He had to face the music, and so he faced it like a man.

"Yes'm," he said, to break the perceptibly lengthening space of silence.

Now for the first time he saw the girl plainly, instead of as the blur that she had appeared before. She stood there with open, trustful eyes, a bit wistful, her face very grave and her manner deliberate, a trifle hesitant. She might be seventeen, not more. Her dress was simple, and all black except for a touch of white at throat and wrists. When she spoke, her voice was very low.

"I was looking, sir, for a Mr. Killmillan," she said. "They told me I'd have to see him first."

JACK KILLMILLAN'S COURTSHIP

BY

E. FRENCH STROTHER

There was a question in her eyes, which moved from Jack's face to the storekeeper's and back to Jack's.

"That's me," he replied, in a voice that growled unintentionally, a fact that caused her to start a little and him to hastily clear his throat and add, in a carefully pleasanter tone, "that is, my name's Killmillan, so I reckon I'm the fellow you're lookin' for."

"Yes, sir," she continued, in the same grave, low voice, "they told me at the mill that I'd have to ask you first if I might show this book to the men. I'm selling it. You see," she went on, drawing a book from a bag on her arm and handing it to Jack, "it's a good book and won't do the men any harm; it's the Lives of the Saints."

Jack gingerly took the book and opened the gaudy blue cover, embellished with silver gilt lettering and a picture, and turned the leaves over from page to page of the hideous caricatures that illustrate subscription books of the kind. Suddenly he became conscious of the fact that he still had his hat on, and with a rapid schoolboy gesture of guilt he reached up to jerk it off. The violence of the movement and his confusion made him drop the book, and in reaching as violently for it, he tripped and fell on the floor at the girl's feet. But he was on his feet again like a cat, and snatched the book open and continued to pore over the pages. The storekeeper was amazed; he had caught the significance of a suppressed aspirate sound of "h" when the girl had handed the book to Jack, and had waited for an explosion, minus profanity. Instead, only increasing intentness as Jack slowly turned from page to page.

The girl, meanwhile, had watched Jack's gymnastic feat with eyes opened wider in wonderment, but with no change from the modest gravity of her demeanor. At length, Jack closed the book and turned it over and over in his hands. He spoke without looking at the girl, in a voice in which deference and gentleness were combined.

"What might you be sellin' that book for?" he asked.

"It's the only way I have to make a living," she answered, dropping her eyes.

"I mean, how much do you sell 'em fer apiece?"

"Oh, excuse me. Why, two dollars."

"You got more'n this one, ain't you?"

"I have ten with me. The rest are at the ranch. I hardly ever sell more than two a day."

"I'll take ten, then," said Jack, still looking down at the book he was turning over in his hands.

"Oh, thank you, sir. But," the girl's face flushed and she spoke slowly, "you aren't buying them just because I said that, are you? I couldn't let you do that."

"No, ma'am," Jack replied, the growl coming back into his voice. "Some religion wouldn't harm this here camp none. But," and a gentleness came into his voice and a faraway look into his eyes. "I'll tell you honest why I bought 'em. I got some little nieces back to Michigan, and them books'll please 'em to death. Yessir," he added, to himself, "them kids'll be tickled to death with them books."

He drew out a handful of money from his overalls pocket and fingered it over.

"Two tens. That right?" and handed them to the girl.

"En you come here again soon's you can with some more books and you c'n sell all of 'em you can to these here fellows. 'F anybody says anything to you, tell 'em Jack Killmillan sent you, and you won't have no trouble with him, I reckon," and he clamped his jaws down with a snap.

Some of the lumberjacks wondered why the "man on the black horse" had not made his usual rounds that afternoon. When they came straggling into camp at dusk to wash up for supper, they found the terror of the woods seated on the steps of the commissary, with a book in his lap, his forefinger moving slowly from side to side of the page. At his side was a stack of gaudy blue books. Nobody ventured an impertinent question, but as they passed by him, going into the commissary for the daily mail, some caught the name on the books, and nudged their fellows.

Night descends upon the mountains in swiftly falling folds of impalpable darkness. The lights in the cabins of Camp 5 gleamed from the little windows and from beneath the loosely swung doors. A little while and these were gone. Lumberjacks sleep early. But the boss of the woods sleeps when he can. The nightwatchmen watch for forest fires, but the boss must watch the nightwatchmen. So the stable boss asked no questions, even in his own mind, when Jack Killmillan called for his bay horse at eight o'clock, and rode out of the corral into the starlit night. And Jack Killmillan asked no questions of the horse as he turned him into the dark trail beneath the cathedral pines, heading down the ravine toward Lost Creek Flats. The horse was as good a woodsman as he, and took the trail at a rapid walk.

By nine o'clock, rider and horse emerged on the flats. A light still shone from the solitary house that stood in the middle of the little meadow. As he entered the flat, Jack paused. He had seen the house before, but, having heard that it was tenanted only by two women, a widow and her daughter, he had always given it a wide berth. Tonight he was plainly headed for it, but now that he neared it he hesitated. For a moment he seemed about to turn back. Just then his horse whinnied, and the door of the house opened and a girl's figure appeared outlined against the light.

"Hello!" she called. "Somebody there?"

Jack ground his teeth together and drove the spurs into his horse's flanks, and they galloped up to the doorway and reined in so quickly that the horse reared on his haunches.

"Yes'm," Jack roared, as he flung off the horse and threw the reins over his head, letting them trail to the ground. "Be you the woman what sells the books?" he added, in a voice that could have been heard half way back to camp.

"Y-yes," the girl faltered, as Jack strode into the light, his eyes gleaming and his fierce mustache bristling. He would have been a startling object at that hour to any man. To this girl, he was terrifying.

"Yes, sir. Is there anything the matter with them?" she added.

Jack did not answer. Instead, he started to brush by her, calling, as he did so, in tremendous tones:

"Where's yer ma? Where's yer ma?"

"I'm Mrs. Martin," said a voice, and Jack followed its sound into the simple little sitting room, where an elderly woman sat sewing by a table on which an oil lamp stood. The girl closed the front door and followed Jack into the sitting room, standing in the doorway behind him. The older woman looked up from her sewing, and spoke gently:

"Excuse me for not getting up to greet you," she said, and pointed to a pair of crutches, adding, "It is hard for me to rise."

"Don't you bother none about me," Jack replied, and began twirling his hat in his hands and looking down at it. Then he blurted out, roughly, turning to the girl and addressing her:

"You can't sell none of them books in the camp. You musn't do it, I tell you."

Tears rose to the girl's eyes as she replied:

"I didn't sell any till I had asked you, and I thought you said it would be all right, and I was so glad"—her face flushed and she added hotly—"but if your word is no good I can get along very well without your old camp, anyway."

Jack realized that it was his manner that offended, though, rather than what he had said, but he replied in his former tone, with an air of bravado:

"My word's good enough. And that ain't what I meant." He turned to the mother. "But that ain't no place for the likes of her. She ain't got no business foolin' 'round them ruffians. No tellin' who she'll run into. I try to weed out all the skunks early in the season, but sometimes I overlook some o' the sons-o'—." Jack had warmed to his theme so as nearly to forget himself, but caught himself in time and gulped, then hurried on—"I can't tell all the skunks, and a nice girl like her ain't got no business takin' chances o' bein' insulted."

He paused for a moment and looked around the room. Then he blurted out again:

"Why'n thunderation don't she stay home? You've got a ranch here. Can't you make it pay?"

Mrs. Martin shook her head:

"There's no man to run it."

Jack's eyes gleamed.

"That's it," he shouted. "You ain't got a man. That's what I come here for. Looka me! I'm the man! No, sir, not a word out of you. I'm the boss o' these here woods. I make five hundred dollars a month, me, and I live like a hog. Yes, sir, like a hog in a cabin up yonder. An' no wonder, I'm a savage, that's what. Never talked to a woman 'cept my mother. Never saw a woman I warn't scared of. And I'm scared o' her," he pointed at the girl, "but, by thunder, I ain't so scared of her but what I know a good thing when I see it. She's got grit, that girl, she's my style, 'n I want her'n you to cut out this here damnation lonesome ranch and I want to cut out my cussed lonely cabin and make a partnership out o' it. Name your terms. That's just what we'll do. Ain't it?"

Jack's eloquence had carried him beyond realization of everything but the gorgeous solution pictured to his eyes. The girl brought him to earth. She advanced toward him with flashing eyes and clenched fists:

"That's just what we won't do," she retorted. "You're the most impudent person I ever saw. Leave this house, sir—instantly!" and she drew herself up to five feet two of slender majesty and pointed to the door.

Jack was dazed for a moment. Slowly he recovered his self-possession. At last it dawned upon him that, in his enthusiasm, he had blurted out what he had intended to come at only gradually. At length he looked up and spoke with defiance in his eyes but with a change in his voice, which was now soft and persuasive. He spoke to the older woman, ignoring the girl:

"Well, it's out, anyway. I didn't mean to say it so soon, an' I didn't mean no harm. What I want know is, would you have any objections, ma'am, if I ast this here young lady to go a-ridin' horseback with me. I've got the best horse on the hill, ma'am, I really have, gentle as a kitten, 'n I'd be most pleased to death 'f you'd let me ask her to ride him."

The woman had been quite composed throughout the whole scene, and had studied Jack's face intently though unobtrusively the whole time. Now she looked up at him with a not forbidding look in her eyes, perhaps a twinkle, but her face was very grave.

"I have no objection, Mr.—Mr.—"

"Killmillan," Jack added, eagerly.

"Mr. Killmillan; but Lucy, of course, knows her own mind about that."

Lucy's mind was very evidently known to herself, for when Jack turned and looked at her she was shaking her head vigorously and looking almost angrily at her mother, trying to convey the negative signal to her.

"Please, Miss Lucy," pleaded Jack. "I'm dreadful sorry for what I said. 'N you c'n sell all the books you want to them durned heathens. But that black horse o' mine is a beaut, fer a fact he is. 'N I'd give a thousand dollars to have a sight o' you ridin' him."

Jack's voice would have charmed the birds out of the trees. Lucy still shook her head, though she cast a questioning glance from time to time toward her mother, whose head was bent again over her work. Jack went on, stepping to the door and throwing it open:

"Jes' look here, Miss Lucy. Ho, Joe! Ho, Joe! Looka him. That's the bay. See how he comes right up 'n eats out your hand. 'N he ain't half's fine a horse's that black."

Lemme come over Sunday 'n jes' show him to you."

Anyway, the next Sunday the stable boss was astonished to see Jack enter the stable at five in the morning, saddle his bay horse himself and then throw on the black horse only a bridle and leave, without a word, leading the black. And Sunday evening after dark, to see the black led in again, with saddle marks plainly visible, but no saddle. This happened every Sunday for a few weeks, then often in the evenings of week days. Gradually the word went about the camp concerning these mysterious goings and comings. And with it went the tales of teamsters who claimed that they had seen Jack and a girl! Yes, sir, Jack Killmillan, by all that was blasphemous and all that was holy, out riding with a girl. And gradually the name of the girl was added, and the myth became conviction.

Then the storekeeper recalled the book episode, and the circle of evidence was complete. But now it began to take on new trimmings, in the mouths of men with evil minds. Ugly suggestions were added to it, and the camp began to nudge and nod and wink and grin.

Jack had no intimations of the fact that his romance had been found out until he rode over one Saturday evening to the Hillside Saloon. Lumberjacks here went on their weekly spree, and gamblers congregated here to help relieve them of their wages. Jack entered the bar looking for one of the logging bosses, and stopped to take a drink. As he stood facing the bartender he became conscious of a lull in the talk at the card tables behind him, and turned to find the eyes of everybody in the room upon him. When they saw him turn, all eyes were dropped again to the cards or turned elsewhere, and an effort was made to resume the clatter of conversation. All eyes but one, those of Jim Malone, a huge timber feller whom Jack had fired a week before for failing to sober up. Malone had spent the past week in the saloon drinking and gambling and cursing Killmillan. Nobody had ventured to cross him, because he was a terror in a fight, at any time, and now he was viciously ugly. Malone stared at Jack with an expression of leering insolence too obviously intentional to be ignored. Jack's mustache bristled as it did whenever he faced trouble and he walked up to Malone, who bulked taller and more massive even than he.

"Here I am, Jim Malone," he snapped out. "You seem to be lookin' fer trouble. That's me. Spit it out!"

Malone eyed Jack malevolently.

"You're a nice one," he began, "you that fires a man fer takin' a drop too much, 'n lettin' on to be such a angel yourself. Oh, yes. Mebbe I takes a drop too much. All right, that's my business. But I don't let on to be no saint, 'n then go'n the dark o' the moon a runnin' round 'n playin' loose with a pore innocent widow woman's daughter."

A low laugh ran around the room.

"What d'ye mean, you — — —," Jack's voice was hoarse with anger.

"Oh, everybody knows 'bout you'n that Lucy Martin girl—"

Jack's fist shot out and took Malone's jaw clean. He gave the grunt of a felled ox, and went to the floor unconscious, blood streaming from his mouth. Jack turned to the tables.

"Stand up, the hound among ye that laughed."

His eyes roved from face to face. Every eye fell before the blaze of his.

"That's what ye are—curs, that a real man'd be ashamed to spit on. Ye're the sort that slander women. Yah! Ye don't dare bring that sort of thing to a man. Not a word, eh? Well, you kin git out o' here. Out! Er I'll brain the pack o' ye."

The saloon emptied swiftly, silently. Jack looked at the barkeeper. He was busily washing glasses and looking down. Then he looked at Jim Malone, conscious now and groaning on the floor.

"Anything more outer you?" he demanded.

Malone answered only with a groan.

Jack turned and strode outside. He untied his horse and mounted, then sat still for a moment in a reverie. The next moment he dashed away. An hour later the door of the Martin cabin burst open and Jack Killmillan faced the two women, his eyes flashing and angry spots of red blazing on his cheeks.

"Git yer hat," he said to Lucy, and his voice was a command, "and come on!"

"Why, what's the matter? Where are you going?" Lucy asked, frightened at his look.

"We're goin' to git married, you'n me. Right now. There's a damned slander loose in this here camp, and you'n me are in it. I've jist smashed Jim Malone for it and I'd have licked the pack o' dogs that laughed at it if they'd been men instid o' dogs. I made 'em eat it. I kin fight slanders down that're on me, but that don't stop 'em talkin' 'bout you, 'n I ain't goin' to stand for that. You come right on and we'll go to the county seat 'n git married."

Lucy's face had flushed at his first sentence, and then her eyes had flashed and then filled with tears. But at his last words she drew back. She stood looking at him with wide-staring eyes, and with an expression half of terror in her face. Gradually that look faded. She blushed and dropped her eyes.

"Marry?" she said. "I haven't been asked yet."

For reply, Jack stepped over to her swiftly. Without a word he picked her up and swung her lightly to his shoulder.

"Good-night, Mrs. Martin," he said. "We'll be back tomorrow night," and strode out the door. A moment later the sound of rattling hoofs grew fainter and fainter down the mountainside. As Mrs. Martin leaned against the door post, straining her eyes to follow them, and sobbing aloud, a man came around the corner of the house.

"Evenin', ma'am," he said. "Jack sent me to look out fer you. I'll put up in the hay out'n the barn, 'n if you need me jes' holler. But I reckon likely you wont. Jack Killmillan's sort o' posted this ranch ez a place to leave alone, and taint likely anybody'll do no trespassin'."

Which they did not. And the tongue of slander stopped wagging before the door of Mr. and Mrs. Jack Killmillan, plus Mrs. Killmillan's mother. But the tongues of the camp gossips long wondered how Jack Killmillan ever got his courage up to propose. And Jack himself often wondered how it happened. Sometimes yet he looks quizzically at a row of ten volumes of the Lives of the Saints, in blue covers with silver gilt binding, scratches his head and grins, and mutters unctuously a monosyllable that seems rather inept, for it ends with double "L."

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

What Martial Law Is Like

Primitive man knew no way of righting a wrong except with a club. In every social order there is a substratum of primitive men, and nearly all men become primitive when over-mastered by some ruling passion. Hence riots and insurrections are to be provided against in any scheme of government. California has made such provision.

During the street car strike in San Francisco some years since passengers were assaulted, men who undertook to operate cars were dragged from them and beaten, much property was destroyed, redhot bolts were hurled from tall buildings in process of construction upon the heads of persons below and it seemed not unlikely that the city would be given over into the hands of a mob, the more likely because the government of the city was then in the hands of men of doubtful character and the police force was supposed to be in sympathy with the rioters.

Now it is the first duty of a city to govern itself if it can. Its police should cope with the difficulty if it has the power. To give it power the mayor has authority to call upon able bodied citizens to do police duty, but if order cannot be restored in that way the military arm of the state may be called into requisition. During the street car strike Governor Gillett had the National Guard ready to be called into action, but it was not actually called. The fact that the National Guard was within call helped the mob spirit to control itself. There is nothing that more greatly aids an angry person, or number of persons, to re-establish self-control, than the knowledge that, in the event of failure, there is a power outside of self that can control. A small, disciplined, order-obeying force can control an unorganized mob a hundred times its own numbers if only it makes the mob know that it is in earnest.

Commonly where a city or community fails to establish order, and the state is called upon to aid, it merely aids. It places its forces at the disposal of the mayor or chief of police to supplement the power of the police, but there are cases in which the civil authorities so go to pieces that the state has to assume entire control through its military arm. In such cases the courts are set aside and justice is determined and executed by military processes.

It all rests in the discretion of the governor. When he thinks that his interference is needed because a state of insurrection exists he makes proclamation to that effect, orders the requisite forces into the field and places them under the command of such officers as he thinks best, although he is commander-in-chief and may himself assume control. Usually he chooses the ranking officer to command.

There are two kinds of law, sometimes confused in the minds of those who have not especially studied the subject. One is "martial," the other is "military." Martial law is for the government of citizens within the district where that form of law has been proclaimed either by the governor of a state or the president of the United States, and it is for the government of civilians within that district. Military law exists wherever there is a military force, whenever there is a military force, and it is for the government of the military force, its own officers and men. It only touches civilians when they are found acting as spies or aiding or abetting the enemy. Its decisions are summarily executed and no appeal lies to civil courts.

If martial law be declared justice will be administered during its continuance as the commanding officer may deem best. His will will be the supreme law, but he will generally manifest it through a court-martial of thirteen commissioned officers, if so many can be spared, although he may constitute his court of as few as five officers, one of whom he will designate as president of the court. He will then appoint a judge-advocate, who will both prosecute and defend; that is, he will conduct the case for the prosecuting or complaining officer and, at the same time, prevent the putting of leading questions to the witnesses. The members of the court will ask questions, too, will reach a verdict and certify the whole to the commanding officer for approval. According to law jails and state prisons must receive prisoners and, if the offense warrants it, executions may take place at the hands of a squad of soldiery.

Being a form of government by men and not by law, martial law, which is little more than the will of the officer in command, is seldom resorted to and the presumption is against its being necessary, yet sometimes it is necessary. Society abhors disorder as nature abhors a vacuum and generally makes shift to preserve order even if it has to employ the rope or the file of soldiers with loaded rifles.

Sometimes while this form of law is taking care of the issues growing out of disorder the civil courts are going right along settling such differences between citizens as do not involve the public peace or the authority of the military tribunal. If the state be not able to establish order the forces of the United States may be called for by the governor, so we see that resistance to authority, and the spirit of mob rule and insurrection, give small promise of being successfully applied anywhere. What the state cannot do Uncle Sam can.

was laudable. They wanted especially to turn out the county clerk and two supervisors. To this end they compromised with as bad elements as there are in the county, made "gentlemen's agreements" with that element. As well might they have made "gentlemen's agreements" with pickpockets! The gentleman respects his agreement, the pickpocket picks the pocket of the gentleman and makes off with both copies of the agreement. Result: the good government organization is itself more or less discredited and the court-house ring still rings. The pickle the President is in should have taught them that compromises with the representatives of bad policies make trouble. If Alameda county is to be redeemed to good government it will be after a group of men have stood up and taken a few good lickings with unimpeachable candidates. Once having gained the confidence of the public in that way they can clean up Alameda cities and Alameda county once for all. There is no other way.

A Soft Spot

NELSON A. ALDRICH has attained his three score years and ten, is about to retire from public life full (we shan't undertake to say of what), and is about to build for himself a palatial residence. It is estimated that it will cost $400,000, but he could live as happily and die as decently in a home costing a tenth as much and, at the same time, avoid disclosing that soft spot in his make-up that tends to vainglory.

Beware of the Froth

THOSE WHO FAVOR THE RECALL should beware how they make the percentage of petitioners so low as to require the participation of none below the froth on the political mug. The top ten or fifteen percent of any voting constituency is likely to slop over at the slightest provocation.

Why Shouldn't They?

A FAR EASTERN EDITOR sends the warning home to England that, as soon as the Hindus awaken to the fact that they can govern themselves as well as Britain can govern them, they will "sweep British control away in a breath." Why shouldn't they?

The Price of Harmony

REPUBLICAN "REGULARS" ARE INSISTENT on knowing their status in the new regime. It is simple. Accept the results of the conflict in good faith, cut loose from Herrinism and behave. In other words, repent, believe and be baptized into the new faith.

Waiting To Catch Up

THE COTTON MANUFACTURERS of the United States no longer contravene anti-trust laws by fixing prices. They merely shut down the works until consumption catches up and prices fix themselves. Great idea for men of means, but, somehow, it neither tends to decrease the cost of living nor increase the earning power of factory workers in general. But then, it isn't any of their business.

A Plank For Every Platform

THIS FROM THE COMMONWEALTH CLUB, of San Francisco, an organization from which California has a right to expect much: "We pledge our candidates for the legislature to work and vote for such revision of the laws of criminal procedure in this state as shall make the administration of justice more speedy and certain." If we can add to a better procedure a better appellate judiciary, a judiciary that will obey the statutes in spirit and truth, our state may come to be less abundantly supplied with malefactors of great wealth who commit crime and then demand to know what we are going to do about it.

We Move To Amend

A SAN FRANCISCO PAPER lately announced in large type that "the 'organization' control of the Republican party will retire from office in a blaze of glory." We move to amend by striking out "of glory."

Hair-Trigger Preferred

THE HONORABLE, THE SECRETARY of the Interior (readers are so tired of the word "Ballinger" that only ill-advised persons will employ it) affirms that only "hair-trigger reformers" hold to the principle that an executive officer can do aught not laid down for him by congressional enactment, and that therein lies the main difference between his administration of that office and that of his predecessor. It has been hitherto held that immemorial usage has the force of law, and it has been the custom of executive officers to perform the recognized functions of executive offices ever since government was, whether laid down in the statutes or not. The hair-trigger method is to be preferred, Mr. Secretary. It saves the national bacon.

What Can the Matter Be?

A NEW BEDFORD (Mass.) factory family of five earns $25.08 per week and it costs it $21.15 to live, leaving a balance of $3.93 for the rainy day. A Burnley (England) factory family of five earns $17.97 (pauper wages) per week and it costs it $12.44 to live, rainy day balance $5.53. In the name of the "best tariff ever," what in thunder is the matter with these figures?

Lorimer's Model Man

LEE O'NEIL BROWNE, who handled the sack for the buying of Democratic votes in the Illinois legislature for the election of Billy Lorimer to the United States senate, is declared by the senator to be a "model citizen and an honorable, upright, God-fearing man." If anyone has reason to fear God it is about that kind of a man.

Mistaken

A ONE-TIME ADMIRER of The California Weekly cut it square off because it was found supporting for office a man whom he did not like, declaring that he wanted a paper on which he could absolutely depend for wise guidance in all such matters. He was mistaken. It isn't a paper that he wants, but a guardian. A paper that should remove all need for private investigation and judgment in matters political would deserve to be burnt in the market place as destructive of an independent and self-reliant manhood. Of his paper a reader has a right to demand good faith and good sense, no more.

Corpus Delicti

IT IS REPORTED FROM LONDON that Dr. Crippen may never be prosecuted for the murder of his actress wife, for the reason that he murdered her so thoroughly as to have removed all positive evidence that any part of her remains exist to prove that she is dead. The fragments of a human female found in the cellar of the house he occupied may have been there before or may have belonged to some one else. Moral: Only the bungler is punished even in England.

What If It Should Pay?

IF THE PANAMA-PACIFIC EXPOSITION should return the capital invested by state, city and subscribers, and return a profit, whose returned capital and profit shall they be? Shall they share pro rata or shall the proceeds all go to the Panama-Pacific corporation? The time to count those eggs is before they are laid.

Inevitable Tariff Tendencies

Sir Wilfred Laurier has just been across Canada. He has been meeting the people and he finds this to be the attitude of Canadians on the tariff issue: The east coast and the west coast want protection. The interior wants tariffs reduced to a revenue basis. The coasts have held the power hitherto, but the interior is developing the more rapidly and will soon hold the destinies of Canada in its own grasp, leaving the coasts at the mercy of the interior save as the opinions of the interior are like to be modified in the interests of the common good.

The condition of the United States relative to tariffs is not unlike that of Canada. The Atlantic and Pacific coasts want protection and a good deal of it. The interior does not need protection and is inclined to reduce tariffs, if not to a revenue only, at least to a revenue mainly basis, with such protection as a careful, honest and scientific investigation into the facts may show to be indispensable to coast industries.

Heretofore the Atlantic coast states have dominated, not because they had the population or the wealth, but because they had so manipulated party as to retain political power in their own hands. The great interior can dominate. It will do it. If the issue is to be settled by a fight the Middle West will win the fight. It has got the votes, and it is going to have them in an ever increasing preponderance. The only refuge for the coasts is to fall back upon a scientifically applied protective policy, designed for the common good and so honestly scheduled as to be above suspicion of being of advantage mainly to aggressive interests. The President appears to have an idea that there is something of the sort in the wind and he has come out in favor of revising the tariff schedule by schedule, session by session, as his tariff board says revision is needed.

The difference between a tariff board, such as we have, and a tariff commission, such as will take charge of the subject in Canada, is not as broad as the continent and similar results may be obtained by both methods. The iniquity of 1909 will have a troubled career and a brief. It is right that it should.

The Best Possible Condition

Theodore Bell, in a personal letter to the editor of the Sacramento Bee, declares that, "I shall do nothing and permit nothing to be done that will in the slightest degree tie my hands or prevent my being a full moral agent after taking the office of governor, if I should be elected," and, "I do not propose to saddle on my conscience the thing that has cursed our state in the past, is now cursing the nation, and has been the greatest cancer that has eaten out the hearts of the nation and the peoples of history," reference being made to special privileges to the few.

Heretofore both political parties in California have been subservient to corporation domination to the special advantage of special interests. That was the worst condition possible. If we have now come to a state of affairs in which both political parties are free of all such domination, if the leaders of these parties stand shoulder to shoulder for a free government and a fair opportunity for all with special privileges to none, then have our lines fallen in pleasant places, then has an era of good feeling and high purpose been ushered in.

We believe that Theodore Bell penned those lines in sincerity. If he did then the contest between Johnson and Bell must be fought on lines other than that of corporation domination. These utterances of Bell's are not to be accepted as final. They were not meant for the public ear. Neither ticket is to be judged by its head alone. A hundred other quantities enter into the equation, but it is going to be important to know, if we may, that whichever wins Herrinism loses. Watch the symptoms. Watch them close. The whole situation will bear much watching.

Land as an Absorbent

Good alfalfa land is renting for more in Tulare county than it could have been sold for thirty years ago. When the railroad reached that county the land value promptly absorbed the value of the added benefit. When water was taken out of the rivers and applied to the land the land absorbed the added value as readily as it had absorbed the water. Every successful experiment made in the culture of the grape, the peach, the orange, was instantly reflected in the increased price of land. Was the freight rate on wheat lowered? The land rather than the cultivator of the soil took the larger benefit. It was thought to be too hot a country for successful dairying, that alfalfa bloated the cows too much, and that "alfalfa butter" wasn't good butter anyway, but the discovery was made that good butter could be made in a hot valley and that "alfalfa butter" is a myth. What is the result? Why, merely that good alfalfa land will rent for more in annual cash rent than the land could have been sold for twenty-five years ago. The advance in the price of the land has absorbed the full value of every forward step taken by science or industry. What is true in Tulare county is true in every county, in every state and every country. The land absorbs to itself, in the form of enhanced value, the greater part of the results of applied science and industry, from which fact we draw two conclusions: One is that whoever would be anchored to prosperity, and transmit prosperity to his children, should possess himself of good land. The other is that a land tax is everlastingly a just tax. It recovers for the common good some portion of what has been absorbed from the common earnings. This does not imply single tax, but only land tax.

Unduly Exercised

Certain governors of states but lately assembled at Salt Lake and there resolved many things with regard to that portion of the public domain lying and being within the respective states of said governors. Those gentlemen have unduly exercised themselves. Conservation does not contemplate the removal of Uncle Sam's possessions outside of the boundaries of any of the states in which they are now situate, and without being removed the states in which they are situate cannot be deprived of their full usufruct whenever they are converted into marketable commodities. Our forests cannot be taken east and there felled and worked up into lumber and stove wood, our oil districts cannot be transferred to Pennsylvania to replenish the exhausted formations of that commonwealth. All the exploiting that is to be done will have to be done on the ground where that ground now is. All the king's horses and all the king's men can not have it otherwise. The worst that could happen would be to have these resources saved awhile before being exploited and, if done, that would not be an unmixed hardship to our western states. But it will not be done. If the national government retains control of these properties they will be utilized for the benefit of all the people instead of for the benefit of a part of the people. There is where the snoe pinches tender feet. They want this untold wealth to be put into their hands for a song that they may exploit both the resources and the people. That is all there is to it. It would be interesting to know whose governors those were who convened last week at Salt Lake and by virtue of whose political prowess they were given their jobs. If we knew that we might see the issue wonderfully illuminated.

In the Old Swing

Theodore Roosevelt is out upon one of his well-loved "swings around the circle," followed by two carloads of bright young gentlemen who will convey to millions something of what he says to thousands. Only the high points will be hit, and they will be "hit off." The daily press is for those who grab a bite and run. It would be profitable to know what this first citizen of the civilized world had to say to the Patrons of Husbandry in relation to the premier industry of this nation. We may get it through the New York Outlook, but not through the daily press which kindles tomorrow's fires. It is not likely that Colonel Roosevelt will say many new things, but rather will he say old things that should be ever new, such things as, in the hurry of life and its fevered aims, we forget and so lose our moral bearings. When he shall have completed his circuit the American conscience will have been quickened anew and the people will have been spoken to that they may go forward, politically, industrially, morally. The waves of sentiment he will have set in motion will culminate at St. Paul when the conservation congress is in session. That, in part at least, is what the "swing" is for.

Hoke Smith

The triumph of Hoke Smith in the Georgia primary is regrettable. Hoke Smith has come to be a reactionary, a veritable negro-baiter. His victory over Governor Brown is notice to the world that the "progressive" Democracy of Georgia has about-faced and is doing its progressing toward ante-bellum conditions. Hoke Smith would not only deny to the negro civil rights, but his deliberate purpose appears to be to reduce the black race to a servile, serving class and so fix his status there that no member of that race will ever rise above it. He has as much as said that he would close the avenues of skilled labor to the black man because he is black, that no black man should hold a job that a white man would care to hold. That is what Georgia has voted for. It is a shame to Georgia. In the language of our first citizen, "All men up, and not some men down," should be the motto for America, of which Georgia is irremediably a part.

The Hermit Kingdom

The fate of Korea is the fate of every country that does not keep the world's pace. It will avail nothing to waste tears over the ravaged liberties of a free people, a people that desired to live within themselves and to themselves and let the rest of the world go on about its business. It is a part of the world's business to see to it that the world moves, all of it, and that it keeps step. Russia, great hulking mass that it is, is being forced to move. It is far down the procession, but it is coming on. Korea squatted in the path and declared it would not budge, but it is budging, kicking and squalling, and yet budging. To be sure it is inside of Japan, but it has joined the march of human progress. The fate of Korea will be the fate of Central America. It is not forever that Nicaragua will be permitted to play thumbs up and thumbs down with the commerce and comity of the nations. Congratulations to Japan! It has done the thing inevitable. Uncle Sam should do likewise with reference to Panama and Central America, if not this year or next then some other year not far distant. World pressure will yet force his hand.

The Bay Cities' Proposition

As our leading article this week the proposals of the Bay Cities Water Company are considered by one in a position to throw light on the subject. The issue is vital to the interests of the prosperous and delightful cities that border the eastern shores of San Francisco bay. Their supply of fresh water is inadequate and unsatisfactory. It must be bettered and enlarged. How shall it be done? Certainly not by the individual action of individual property owners contracting with irresponsible agents of a corporation whose proposals have not been proved to the satisfaction of the collective whole. We are not saying that the proposals of the Bay Cities Water Company are bad, or that the water company is itself irresponsible and shrewd rather than sound. Our contention is that whatever is done should be done by all acting for one and one for all, not each for each. It is a situation where collective bargaining becomes imperative. It is a matter in which cities should act as cities and not individuals as individuals. Our leading article is respectfully commended to the thoughtful consideration of east bay property owners.

Lesson of the Fires

The forest fires that have prevailed the past week have proven a calamity to the nation. Scores of lives have been lost, millions of wealth have been consumed, hardship has been inflicted and homes destroyed. It is not now known that human foresight could have prevented all of these catastrophes, but the likelihood is that, in most instances, human foresight did not try. Owners of timber have been strangely neglectful of their own and the public interest. The state must invade the strongholds of an ultra individualism and compel each holder of timbered lands to so use his own as not to injure, or jeopardize, either a neighbor's property or his own. No man owns timbered lands. He merely holds them and holds them subject to the common welfare. His interest is that of a stewardship. To that stewardship he must be held in strict account. It is not impossible that enough has been lost during the past week to have safeguarded the section burned over to the end of the present century.

Who Fetches the Hindus?

Answer by asking who fetched the Chinese, who the Greeks, the ignorant sort from the south and east of Europe, who scattered the Mexican peons along all our coast and through all our valleys? If this answer be not sufficient, look to see where these Hindus go upon their arrival. It will be found that they go where went those who came before, to the section gangs on the railroads. There is no department of railroading more important to the safety of travel than the maintenance-of-way, and yet to that department go the least responsible, the cheapest and the poorest help that the ransacked world can produce. Is it any wonder that rails spread? Many a thrifty American citizen, yes, many a railroad contractor, superintendent, president, got his start as a section hand, but that was when the section hand was paid a white man's wages and when he yielded a white man's fidelity to the trust imposed. If responsibility would be had it must be paid for. If it be not had, the lack of it must be paid for, too, in terms of wrecked trains, maimed bodies, destroyed lives. That absentee landlordism that owns our railroads, and is concerned only for dividends and stock quotations; and that non-stockholding, hiring administrative force that cares for little save a good showing in its own department, upon which showing the high salaries depend—it is to these that we are mainly indebted for needless hazards of travel and the degradation of our citizenship. Put the responsibility where it belongs.

The Crocker Canines

That riches cannot bar sorrow from the gate is exemplified in that the grim reaper entered the kennels of the Crocker terriers at Hillsborough and carried off a number of brindle bowlegged Boston pups of the reputed aggregate value of $17,500. But the mistress of the kennel mourns not as without hope. Another "pup" is coming by special car all the way from Boston, at an expense of other thousands that he may sustain the royal prestige of that royal canine line. It is not worth while to become bitter in reflecting upon this silly fad of this silly young woman. Who of us, surrounded by so many silly and idle persons as she, could be sure of being less silly than she; and yet when one thinks on the myriad enterprises richly worth while suffering for want of financial aid we know that such waste of wealth is worse than silly. It is ethically criminal. It makes it clear that society, for its own protection, must at death dip liberally into every private fortune and then so compel the absolute division among the heirs of what is not taken for the common treasury as to make it inevitable that fool and money shall promptly part company. Poverty must be made the end of prodigality. Our inheritance laws must seek to reduce to a minimum such flauntings in the faces of the many whose lives are hard of the follies of the few who chance to be the grandchildren of financial brigands.

Again, One Or None

If a Panama-Pacific exposition is to be held in San Francisco five years hence it is appropriate that the state contribute a substantial sum to its success. Perhaps $5,000,000 is not too much. If such an exposition is to be held in San Francisco it is appropriate that San Francisco, as a municipality, contribute to that end, and perhaps $5,000,000 is not too much. But suppose New Orleans goes ahead and holds an exposition also, ought these great sums to be raised and expended just the same? We think not. We think that a fight should be made in congress for a determination by congress that only one such exposition shall be held, with the aid and support of the national government, and where it shall be held. Unless San Francisco is to be the place for holding that exposition then it should hold none. It is all right to authorize the state and authorize the city to make these expenditures, but the authorizations should be made contingent upon there being one exposition or none. Unless these appropriations are made contingent upon that event, and plainly so, there may be difficulty in carrying the proposals before the people. And there should be.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

For four hundred years the top of the world was the quest of the bravest and strongest and most daring of our navigators. That quest cost hundreds of lives, hells of suffering and millions of dollars, and when at last it was reached, by a man who had devoted twenty-three years of his life to the enterprise, there was nothing there, not a thing in the world but ice and snow and bad weather. The inflexibility of purpose of the indomitable Peary developed in him traits seemingly so ungenerous that, despite his great achievement, his country turned from him to half sympathize with a rival who had struggled as hard and endured as much as he and, to cover his failure, had boasted of a success he had not achieved.

Is there any lesson in all this that may touch our own lives helpfully? Perhaps so. There ought to be. Many a less important consummation has made ineffaceable impress upon the minds of millions. Let it be said that Commander Peary deserves better of his country than he has received. The worst that can be said of him was that he seemed to be ungenerous to a rival. Is it human to devote twenty-three years of life, years of exposure and suffering, only to see, without protest, another snatch the laurels out of one's hand? And what man could endure all that Peary had endured and be quite himself at the end? It is time for his country to think better of Peary. A malign and defeated press worked him incalculable injury by misleading the public. Not being given for nothing what another paper had paid for, rival papers turned upon the explorer and rended his reputation into shreds. That is the truth.

But, has the reader a pole star that he is resolved to stand under? If so is it really worth while? Is it absorbing all the sweetness, all the health, all the vigor out of life? Is its realization going to be worth all that it will cost? This is not saying that the achievement of Peary was not worth to the world all that it cost him and his supporters. The question for the reader is, "Is my quest, my indomitable purpose, going to be worth to the world, to me and to mine all that it is to cost?"

It is not unlikely that, some day, we may each of us stand on the top of the world and look back over it and over the trails that we have made on it. Will our tracks be like those of the rabbit seen in the freshly fallen snow, that seem to start nowhere and lead in no direction? Or will they make straight for our bright, particular pole-star? If not straight, will they tend steadily in that direction despite the open "leads" and "pressure ridges" that block our path?

In a sense we are all of us explorers. If we are searching for nothing else we may be seeking to find our true selves and, among the great discoveries of life, self-discovery ranks high. There have been thousands who failed of making that discovery until so late in life that it was of little use to them when found, generally for the reason that they had not really been looking for themselves. They were blundered onto by themselves, as Columbus blundered onto a continent, while looking for something else.

It is good to read Peary's rather prosaic narrative. It is being neglected to the injury of those who neglect it. It has a hundred lessons in it, not alone for those who may seek, after him, also to stand on the top of our material world, but for others who have worlds of their own upon whose top they would stand, and pole-stars of their own that they would fain stand under. Whoever has been persistent, courageous, enduring, inflexible of will and wise in ordaining means to ends, becomes one of the world's teachers. When the mischief which has been done him passes away, as it will, the quest of Peary and its achievement will become an inspiration to countless thousands.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

How Dr. Jordan Would Terminate War

Dr. David Starr Jordan, Stanford University's great president, recently read a paper before the Berlin congress of liberal religions, and the topic he chose for discussion was "War and Manhood." Inasmuch as his paper included a suggested method of terminating warfare on the high seas, and as that would be a long step toward terminating all warfare, it should be of deep interest to all who hope for that day when swords shall be beaten into plowshares. The doctor's plan is very simple, and yet it is submitted that it should be equally practical. In brief, it is this: Before the congress he urged, as he frequently has done heretofore, the establishment of an international law prohibiting the killing of seals, sea otters, whales, etc., outside a three mile limit from land. Thus far all is easy, as none will dispute the right of the nations to make such a law. But now comes the next step which Dr. Jordan would see taken: He would have the killing of men outside that three mile limit also made illegal. Is it not apparently an easy and logical step to take? Yet it would terminate warfare upon the wide oceans, it would make of the world's navies that dead lumber in the junk heap which they become after a decade or so in any event, it would convert mighty Dreadnaughts into useless mementoes of a murderous age—and what consummation could more devoutly be wished? Perhaps all this is a dreamer's dream, but what is there in it which is impractical save that which is made so by the spirit of murder in man's heart? Can man not protect the seals and sea otters, and, if so, then can he not also protect man? May Dr. Jordan ultimately succeed in his righteous mission.

Concerning Lovely Woman and Big Feet

No longer need the otherwise lovely woman with big feet be entirely discouraged; on the dim horizon of the future there is a ray of hope for her. The ray faintly scintillates in the immediate vicinity of Munich, Bavaria. There a society of women has been organized with the object of promulgating the glorious gospel of big feet. The larger the feet the more beautiful and healthy the gentle creature who drags them around, is the motto inscribed on the banner beneath which they proudly take their stand. And, mark you, the women who have joined this society are members of the aristocracy, and there are several hundred of them, their leader being the real, live Austrian Baroness Mohn. They have pledged themselves to appear at all functions, even at court, in the biggest possible shoes with the flattest possible heels. And such a society should grow and extend in many directions, for it has been whispered that there are several women here or there who cover the ground liberally when they stand. But it is dollars to nickels that no women with such feet as poets praise belong, or will belong, to that society.

Increase of Population by Decades

Not until this fall will the population of the United States, as ascertained by this year's census, be officially given out, but it is understood that 90,000,000 is a close official approximation. Accepting this approximation as fairly close, it is of some interest to note by what leaps and bounds the population of this country has advanced in the 120 years since its first census was taken. According to that first census, taken in 1790, the population of the United States was 3,929,214; in 1800 it was 5,308,483; in 1810, 7,239,881; in 1820, 9,663,822; in 1830, 12,866,020; in 1840, 17,069,453; in 1850, 23,191,876; in 1860, 31,443,321; in 1870, 38,558,371; in 1880, 50,155,783; in 1890, 62,622,250; in 1900, 76,303,387; in 1910 (estimated), 90,000,000. It will be noted that the increase in each decade has largely exceeded that of the immediately preceding decade in all instances except the decade covering the time of the civil war, and even during that decade there was an increase of more than seven millions. Note, too, that the increase from 1890 to 1900 need only be equaled in the decade just past in order to make our present population reach the 90,000,000 mark, so that if the increase of past decades is continued we must pass that mark.

Red Stockings and Aviation

Perhaps nothing would have seemed more improbable than that feminine hosiery would get mixed up with aviation, but reports from France indicate that it has done so. It was at the Etampes meeting that the unfortunate and unexpected mixture took place. A Mlle. Abukais was one of the aviators at the meeting, and during her ascensions she wore knickerbockers and red stockings, and the stockings were of no subdued red either, but were of that brilliant vermilion hue which dazzles eyes. In this spectacular costume the Mayor of Etampes saw Miss Abukais, and naturally he was shocked. He was, indeed, so shocked that he had her summoned to court, but the young woman went right ahead and made an ascent so high that nothing but two dots of red could be seen against the azure sky. The next day she again appeared costumed as before, again the mayor had her summoned, and again she flew without changing her garb. There was a precisely similar course of events on every day of the meeting, and now Miss Abukais must appear in court, where decision will be duly and solemnly rendered whether a feminine aviator may wear stockings and, if so, what color they must be. Now that women are entering the aviation field, this is a question that should be decided, and decided right. The world should know what to expect when it is at an aviation meeting.

The World's Socialists

The International Bureau of Socialists, which is recognized as the fountainhead of European socialism, recently published statistics showing what it claims to be the number of socialists in the world. The statistics are acknowledged to be incomplete, inasmuch as they do not give (through lack of ability to obtain them) those pertaining to Russia, Spain and Australia, but, even with this considerable hiatus, they total enough to cause either apprehension or joy, as the point of view may differ, in one who reads them. Here are the figures, as given: Socialists in Germany, 3,250,000; France, 1,000,000; United States, 600,000; Great Britain, 500,000; Belgium, 500,000; Italy, 390,000; Finland, 337,000; Switzerland, 100,000; Denmark, 99,000; Norway, 90,000; Holland, 82,000; Sweden, 75,000. This is a total of 7,023,000. It will be remembered that these are socialist figures furnished from a socialist source, and it goes without the saying that they have not been "underdone" any, but, on the contrary, it is not likely that they have been grossly exaggerated, and, admitting that they have not, it is evident that the problem of socialism is with us, whether as hope or menace, in degree sufficient to warrant earnest and serious consideration.

The American Sweet Tooth

It is evident that the American people have a well developed sweet tooth. Witness the fact that last year they consumed 7,500,000,000 pounds of sugar. If the reader of this paragraph got his share, his sweet tooth called for and received between 80 and 90 pounds of this compressed sweetness last year. Who says the American people do not know a good thing when they taste it?

How Worry Kills Its Victim

Modern science, which discovers many things, has finally determined that the long maintained popular theory that worry kills is sound, and more than that, it tells, rather vaguely to be sure, just how it accomplishes this end. According to a late scientific theory, worry kills by absolutely destroying or impairing beyond repair certain cells of the brain. Of course it would be gratifying just at this point if science would inform us just how and why worry thus injures these cells, but there are certain lines of demarcation in both the physical and spiritual worlds beyond which science cannot go, and the how and why of this brain-cell injury apparently is beyond these lines. Worry, then, hurts these cells, and as the brain is the nerve center of the body, it follows that other organs also finally become diseased, and in the end death results. Thus worry kills, and after it has killed, come the doctors and say, "Heart disease," or "stomach trouble," and their late patient is laid away. So much for science, but after it has spoken it has told us only what the world knew long ago, and it has given us no new suggestion of why and how there is connection between worry and brain cells which suffer. Science indeed is wise, but how shall she avoid being short-sighted in a country where dense mists abound?

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

A ROMANCE OF THE DEEP

By M. L. Theiss-Whaley

(Written for The California Weekly)

She languished in a steamer chair,
He, sauntering by, beheld her there,
A stunning girl, divinely fair.
"O, avis rare!" he muttered.

For straightway he was very sick,
Not of the sea, but love. And quick Sought introduction. My! how thick,
Those two became instant.

His place at table, fortunately,
Made him to be her vis-a-vis.
Little he ate, but greedily,
Her myriad charms devoured.

He helped her up and down the stair;
He ordered fizz; she drank her snare.
Where she was seen, he, too, was there;
A cavalier devoted.

They promenaded, chatted, danced,
Each hour he grew the more entranced.
By leaps and bounds his love advanced,
To point of ardent telling.

But she, divining his intent,
His amorous words would aye prevent.
For she was but on frolic bent,
With her 'twas simple flirting.

So in fool's Paradise he passed,
The blissful days, until at last,
The trip was o'er. How furious, fast,
His eager heart was thumping.

As, swelled of head, aglow with pride,
He walked the gang plank by her side,
Bearing her trap. I could have cried,
For his confused awakening!

His "avis" flew to love's embrace;
Then turned, and with still witching grace,
Said: "How I thank you, Mr. R—!
Know my betrothed; I've journeyed far,
Once more to meet and wed him."

AN ACADEMY OF LETTERS

The following account from the Springfield Republican recalls the fact that there is a similar Academy of Letters in this country, of which Mark Twain was a member, and suggests some of the potentialities for usefulness that exist in such an institution:

The recent flurry over the rumored foundation of an English academy of letters proves to have been needless. The historian G. M. Trevelyan, who is a member of the "academic committee" recently constituted by the royal society of literature, writes to the London Times denying the reports that a "full-blown" academy after the French model is contemplated. The situation at present is this: Last fall a joint committee was appointed by the royal society of literature and the academy of authors to consider the creation of a body representing literature as the royal academy represents art, the royal society science, and the British academy learning. Recently it made its report, and upon its recommendation the royal society of literature established a subordinate body called the academic committee. Except for this subordinate status, it is modeled very closely after the French academy. Like that it is limited to 40 members, although only 27 were at first appointed. The academicians, or perhaps more properly academic committeemen, are not to wear palm leaves or be called "immortals," or do anything, if it can be helped, to bring down on their heads the ridicule of a country which has been more used to honoring brewers than poets. It was not the purpose, nervously insists Mr. Trevelyan, to "put us up as 'immortal' cockshies."

Nevertheless, the functions of the committee are to be very much like those of the French academy. As stated in its charter, the province and duties of the new body are:

(a) To take all possible measures to maintain the purity of the English language and to hold up a standard of good taste in style;

(b) To encourage fellowship and co-operation among those who are disinterestedly striving for the perfection of English literature;

(c) By "discourses of reception" and "obituary addresses" to mark the current of literary history in this country;

(d) To designate from time to time persons to become recipients of the medals of the society;

(e) To make awards of merit to particular literary works.

It is an excellent program, and the committee should be able to carry it out no less efficiently than if it should take on all the pomp and circumstance of what Mr. Trevelyan calls a "full-blown academy." It can hardly avoid, however, the principle which he objects to in academies, the "distinguishing between rival merit." Certainly in making up the list of members there must have been a purpose to choose the most distinguished and gifted living men of letters, and it is too much to hope that such a committee of eminent authors can be constituted, even "to discharge 'specified functions,'" without exciting jealousy and ill-will. That the choice has fallen, in the main, upon deserving candidates, appears from the list of original members:

Californian Poets' Corner

A CYCLE

By Millicent Washburn Shinn

This well known poem was written by Miss Millicent Shinn when she was an undergraduate of the University of California and appeared in a little collection of college verse which is now a rare volume.

I.

Spring-time—is it spring-time?
Why, as I remember spring,
Almonds bloom and blackbirds sing;
Such a shower of tinted petals drifting to the clovery floor,
Such a multitudinous rapture raining from the sycamore;
And among the orchard trees—
Acres musical with bees—
Moans a wild dove, making silence seem more silent than before.

Yes, that is the blackbird's note;
Almond petals are afloat;
But I had not heard or seen them, for my heart was far away.
Birds and bees and fragrant orchards—ah!
they cannot bring the May;
For the human presence only
That has left my ways so lonely, Ever can bring back the spring-time to my autumn of to-day.

II.

Autumn—is it Autumn?
I remember autumn yields
Dusty roads and stubble-fields;
Weary hills, no longer rippled o'er their windswept slopes with grain;
Trees all gray with dust that gathers ever thicker till the rain;
And where noisy waters drove Downward from the heights above,
Only bare white channels wander stonily across the plain.

Yes, I see the hills are dry,
Stubble-fields about me lie.
What care I when in the channels of my life once more I see
Sweetest founts long sealed and sunken bursting upward glad and free?
Hills may parch or laugh in greenness,
Sky be sadness or serenity,
Thou my life, my best beloved, all my springtime comes with thee.

Cecil Bradley, Robert Bridges, Samuel Henry Butcher, Joseph Conrad, William John Court-hope, Austin Dobson, James George Frazer, Edmund Gosse, Richard Burdon Haldane, Thomas Hardy, Henry James, William Paton Ker, Andrew Lang, Sir Alfred Comyn Lyall, John William Mackail, the Viscount Morley of Blackburn, George Gilbert Murray, Henry Newbolt, Edward Henry Pember, Sir Arthur Wing Pinero, George Walter Prothero, Walter Raleigh, George Macaulay Trevelyan, Arthur Woolgar Verrall, William Butler Yeats. The secretary is Dr. Percy W. Ames.

At the first meeting the names of the novelist, Maurice Hewlett, and the poet, Arthur Christopher Benson, were added, but there is to be no haste in bringing up the number to the sanctioned 40. The office of president has been offered to Lord Morley, and that of perpetual secretary to E. H. Pember, K. C.

In considering the list the first thing to note is the absence of women, an injustice which will doubtless be remedied, or the academy smashed to matchwood, when women get the ballot. In the meantime there is nothing to prevent the authoresses of England from forming an academic committee of their own, or a full-blown academy for that matter, and if palm leaves should please their taste, it is a woman's privilege to wear whatever she likes. The second point which strikes the reader is that the list includes most of the distinguished names in contemporary English letters, besides a few so obscure as to suggest that the material available does not warrant an immediate enlargement of the number. Perhaps when genuine distinction is scanty, the problem might be solved by having two classes of academicians, the immortals and the semi-immortals, so to speak. Thus a man like Thomas Hardy or Henry James might be elected for life, while minor and younger men whom it would be invidious to mention could be chosen for say five years, and confirmed at the expiration of the term if their growing reputation and their academic usefulness should warrant it.

It is to be observed, however, that it is no just cause for criticism or ridicule if a part of the membership of an academy is obscure, hardly known at all to the general public. It is, in fact, one of the valuable services of an academy to honor achievements which are not of a sort to excite public applause. Learning as distinguishable from letters falls, to be sure, within the province of the British academy, but there is a considerable field which belongs both to scholarship and to literature, and its practitioners are not so likely to be known by the world at large as the novelists or even the poets. A considerable part of the committee is made up of men who have done valuable work, but whose ability has received little recognition except in English literary circles. An academy helps to even the scales and to remind the public that notoriety is not everything—there are some highly successful "best-sellers" who have not been invited to help to "maintain the purity of the English language and to hold up a standard of good taste in style."

The question of the value of academies has been much debated, both in England and America, and the general sentiment has been hostile. It is argued that it is the nature of an academy to be academic, and that the spirit of English literature is too individualistic to brook the tyranny of an organized dictatorship. No chance is lost to point out the weak points of the French academy and to show how the most original and brilliant writers have been rejected by it. Nevertheless the feeling seems to be growing just now that changing conditions are making some such central literary body more needful than formerly. The business of publishing books has increased enormously, and the stress is mainly on the light popular literature of the day. Critical authority has declined, and the machinery for puffery becomes daily more aggressive. Too little distinction is made

THE GREAT AMERICAN SIN

A SOCIETY WHICH HOLDS THAT IT IS PROFANITY

If there be an evil in the land let the heart be cheered with the reflection that there must be at least one, and perhaps a hundred, associations of mortals camping on the trail of that evil, striving to abate, mitigate or annihilate it and never in the world's history was there more unselfish effective work done for Right Things than is being done here and now.

One of the newer associations for the lessening of evil in the world is the "Anti-Profanity Society of the World," with headquarters here in San Francisco. It is doing what it can.

But before we take up the society or its work let us consider a few moments some aspects of the task it has cut out for itself. Profanity is as old as language and with a large number of persons comprises a considerable share of their vocabulary. It seems to be hereditary in the male line and not infrequently it manifests itself in the female line as well. It has its origin in making common that which is held to be sacred.

In all ages of the world, and among all peoples, certain persons or things or places or words have been held to be holy. Custom required that they be treated with respect, but there were always some who failed of showing honor to those things that were looked upon as honorable. This was held to be profanation and was sometimes punished by death. What a mortality would rage if profanity were a capital offense in California! Anyhow for about a week! After that we should be surprised to find that many a sorry swearer had broken short off and made his conversation yea yea and nay nay. It is wonderful what being brought up with a short turn can do for the reformation of a careless person.

The society in question may or may not be in error in declaring profanity to be the "great American sin," but it certainly is one of the most common. Our spoken language is punctuated with it as the air is punctuated with rifle shots on the firing line. Unfortunately this form of punctuation is employed by persons who have no need for it, when they have no need for it and, therefore, without other excuse than a foolish habit foolishly learned in foolish youth when such things seem smart.

If profanity is ever to be tolerated it is in the cases of those astringent mortals whose vocabularies are meagre, persons who can scarcely express themselves without some form of catastrophe similar to an explosion. If heaven ever looks with forbearing eye upon profanity it is in the cases of such persons, but what shall we say of that voluble and picturesque profanity of which men richly endowed in flow of language are guilty? In such cases it is intolerable, and yet there are relatively few fluent talkers, persons to whom eloquence is natural, who are not profane. Theirs must be the greater condemnation.

Profanity is also a symptom of unbridled excess. The excessively profane are excessive otherwise. They overshoot the mark. It is an indication of a character out of balance. The soundness of the judgment of a profane man is to be questioned. He is a blunt fellow incapable of the finer distinctions, as a rule, not one to whom one would go for advice in a matter of life and death.

Nor is strong language necessary to express even the most vehement opinions or portray emotion in the most superlative degree. The language of diplomacy is strong, but even the most tense situations are expressed in language of the most reserved import. As, in the care of the mentally incapable, the most indescribable filthiness is designated, with perfect intelligibility, as being "untidy," so in diplomacy an "unfriendly act" may precipitate a war. Italics have practically gone out of use because people have learned to write forcibly without their use, and profanity may be dispensed with without impoverishing our language. Its inflections will still be able to convey more of meaning than even the most intense will ever experience.

But to get back to our society for the suppression of profanity in America. This society was organized January 20, 1904. Its president is W. A. Smith, its first vice-president, Charles Adams; second vice-president, W. R. Bradshaw; secretary, W. R. Lett, all of San Francisco. The purpose is to invite all moral and religious persons to unite in forming a strong body to put forth a united effort to suppress profanity if possible and to discourage it whenever possible.

Cards have been placed in many depots and other public places where men are likely to be provoked to use profanity, such cards bearing the simple words "Don't Swear." They help to remind the careless of their weakness and so tend to prevent sacrilege. The hope is to place such cards in all cars and where people travel or work or are congregated together, and it is expected that, by these methods alone, the evil will be much lessened.

Then it is proposed, as opportunity offers, to enforce the laws against profanity. Nearly all states have such laws. California has, although little heed is paid to them. Perhaps not all know that there are such laws they are so seldom enforced: "Any person using profane or indecent language in any public place within the hearing of women or children, in a loud and boisterous manner, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be fined not exceeding two hundred dollars, or be sentenced to ninety days' imprisonment or both." So reads the law of this state.

San Francisco has a stringent ordinance against profanity, more stringent even than the state law. It is the purpose of the society to enforce these laws whenever possible and a good many convictions have been secured through the efforts of members of the society. It now has about 7,000 members in all scattered from the Pacific to the Atlantic. No doubt a general enforcement of the law would greatly abate the evil, and if it could be abated for one generation it would almost drop out of our spoken language as it already has, well nigh, out of our written.

Anyone wishing to get in touch with the society can do so by addressing Mr. W. R. Lett, 154 Sutter street, San Francisco. There is much to do and more workers are wanted to help do it.

We have, in this article, treated profanity merely as a bad habit, a thoughtless, foolish over emphasis of opinion, but in truth it is much worse than that. If there be a God of all this universe, a Father of all the children of men, it cannot be less than a sin to use his name as we should not think of using even that of Judas Iscariot or Benedict Arnold. One who does it cannot be guiltless.

It is because this paper takes an interest in whatever is trying to make things better than they are that the Anti-Profanity Society of the World is given this bit of publicity. It is not likely to sigh for new worlds to conquer after having conquered this habit in this one.

even by persons of some intelligence and culture, between artistic success and material success, and the critical are too scattered and too lacking in opportunity for expressing their views to command much influence. But the "crown" bestowed by such an official body as this academic committee should have no little influence in calling attention to unusually well written books and might even make them popular. For example, Mr. Conrad's vogue was greatly hastened by the unofficial crowning of his "Nigger of the Narcissus" by the London Academy, a weekly review which at that time had more weight than now. If the activity of the committee were confined to hunting out and praising well-written books its work would amply justify itself. Even among the literary, nowadays, contempt for good writing is rather the fashion, and this in itself is a rather strong reason for founding an academy. It is to be hoped that England may be able, by the new arrangement, to secure the advantages of such a conservative body.

SUMMER IN KANAWHA

(Edward B. Kenna in Charleston Gazette)

Oh summer in Kanawha, you have this heart of mine
When purple grapes are bursting into ripeness on the vine;
When sweet peas light the trellis like a rainbow gone to bloom
And flood the dozing garden with their subtle sweet perfume;
When bees are softly humming round the apples on the trees
And purple morning glories nod a greeting to the breeze;
When far across the meadows the rippling waters gleam
Like the lazy, mazy, hazy recollection of a dream;
Oh summer is Kanawha, when skies are azure hue
My heart is burning, yearning, ever turning home to you.

Oh, summer in Kanawha, when standing at the gate
And hearing, far across the fields, the part-ridge call his mate;
'Tis sweet to think the world all love, with not a thought of hate,
To dream the dear old dreams again, before it is too late.
Ah, life is worth the living in the golden, dewey morn
When field larks pipe their silver notes across the tasseled corn;
And life is worth the living in the drowsy summer noon;
And dreaming, more than dreaming 'neath the gleaming summer moon;
Oh summer in Kanawha, whenever skies are blue,
My heart is burning, yearning, ever turning home to you.

Oh summer in Kanawha, when twilight shadows fall,
And floating from the mountain comes the night bird's triple call,
'Tis then the dreams come thronging like the ghosts of happiness,
And evening breezes thrill me like a mother's dear caress,
And I see you, sweetheart, waiting at the old familiar place
And I catch the graceful glimmer of the moonlight on your face;
And my thoughts go winging swiftly through the slowly lapsing years
Till my eyes are brimming, swimming, dimming fast with mists of tears.
Oh summer in Kanawha, whenever hearts are true
My heart is burning, yearning, ever turning home to you.

"I cannot understand," wrote the college boy, "why you call yourself a kind father. For three weeks I've had no check from you. Pray, what sort of kindness do you call that?" And the father wrote back: "Unremitting kindness."—Lippincott's.

A young lady who taught a class of small boys in the Sunday school desired to impress on them the meaning of returning thanks before a meal. Turning to one of the class, whose father was a deacon in the church, she asked him: "William, what is the first thing your father says when he sits down to the table?" "He says, 'Go slow with the butter, kids, it's 40 cents a pound,'" replied the youngster.—Everybody's.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

The Good Old Days

Oh, the good old days, and the fine old days,
The days that were rare and mellow,
When "Off with his head!" by a monarch said
Was the end of a likely fellow;
When the guillotine ran on a wholesale plan,
With a butcher to pull its lever,
And the Church and the State on the people sate—
Ah, the good old days forever!

Oh, the good old days, it is them I praise,
And for them we all are sighing,
When the knights were bold, as by poets told,
And their starving serfs were dying;
When "good Queen Bess" raged more or less,
And Henry was wifeless never,
Since he found one new for each one he slew—
Yes, the good old days forever!

Oh, the good old days, and the rare old days,
When villeins were less than cattle,
When questions of right were settled by might
'Midst the roar and the gore of battle;
When the ruling class rode the hopeless mass
To goad and to scourge, oppress them,
And it seemd man's plan to belittle man—
Oh, the good old days, God bless them!

Ship Him to San Francisco

Is there in your community a man who consorts with the vile and is recognized as an adherent of corruption?

Is there a man whose headquarters is a saloon, and who generally is found at his headquarters?

Is there a man whose vocation, before he went into the political game, was that of the pugilist or the tenderloin rounder?

Is there a man who can be relied upon to support every gambling device, from nickel-in-the-slot to horseracing?

Is there a man who always opposes that which is for the moral welfare of the people and favors that which is to its injury?

Is there a man whom the "machine" safely can count upon to heed its beck, run its errands and further its political debaucheries?

Ship him to San Francisco. The chances are fair that the people of this city will send him to the state legislature. But if the man is decent, they probably will drop him at the first opportunity, as they did Callan, who shone in the San Francisco legislative delegation of 1909 like a jewel in a heap of compost.

To be sure, this big city occasionally does send a respectable citizen to the legislature, but when it does people gaze one on another, shake their heads, and inquire, "How did it happen?" and nobody answers, for nobody can guess.

Yes, if you have such a citizen as is described in the opening paragraphs of this article, ship him down here. We cannot absolutely guarantee that he will be sent to the legislature, but he will have a mightily good show; and,
anyway, if you take such action, you will notice that you experience great relief in breathing.
This is not saying that San Francisco never elects decent legislators. It does—sometimes as many as four or five out of 27, as it has done this time; but if you want your moral derelicts honored, ship them this way.

The Evident Distinction

"What's the difference between a suffragist and a suffragette?"

"Why, a suffragist wishes to secure political rights for women."

"All right. What's a suffragette?"

"She's the awful example of what women can be without those rights."

The Opinions of Rufus

If the recordin' angel had to keep track of the things we meant to do, an' didn't, I reckon he'd have resigned his job long 'fore this.

Whether er not a bird in the hand is worth

I've seen them that wan't worth a whoop in

I don't indorse lyin', but I've seen fellers have been more Christian if they'd kind o' edged round it.

I b'lieve it's better not to be so devoted to c'rect language that you can't recognize a good idee when it's expressed with bad grammar.

easier if it wus es easy to do our duty today
es it is to do it tomorrer or even yisterday.

It isn't charity, son, it's justice to recognize that a bad man is a good man gone astray, an' lots o' times the good man would have tions to rattle with.

The World Our Mothers Know

You now have reached the time of life, my dear boy, when you are convinced that you know more about the world than your mother does, and I should not be surprised if you are right. In fact, the more I think of the matter, the more I am confident that you are right;
but, how would you like to have your mother know the world you know, and, for that matter, how would you like to have her know that you are acquainted with it?

You see, my boy, there is in every good mother's soul an ideal of a world in which she hopes to see her son register as citizen. It is a splendid world, this of her dreams, a world of stalwart men who battle beneath the white banner of right nor cringe before the black flag of wrong. It well may be that it is a world in which the garish light of the Great White Way shines not, but neither is the better soul revolted by the scenes familiar there.
And in this fair world of her dreams each good mother's son stands erect and wholly admirable.

As surely as you and I talk together, my dear boy, such is the world in which your mother, in dreams that made her loved features tenderly, divinely beautiful, has seen her son, and—honestly, now—don't you think that it beats "out of sight" the carmine-tinted world into which you have been making little side trips lately? The world of her dreams and hopes for you may not be so fantastically lighted as one you have seen, but don't you fancy that a man would live more comfortably with himself in her world?

I tell you, son, there is such a thing as knowing too much about the world—about the wrong world—and when a boy begins to feel that he knows more about the world than his mother does, it frequently would be a good thing for him to sit down with his best self and seriously inquire if he has not attained that condition of over-knowledge. Perhaps he has not, but I fancy that the odds would be against him in the poolrooms.

Pa and the Calf

Oh, woes of life that come to pass
No matter what we do,
Oh, blighting worries that en masse
Our paths with troubles strew,
My tranquil peace you do not rout,
From you I do not shrink,
When I recall how pa went out
To teach the calf to drink.

The calf was young, its health was sound—
"So, bossy! Do not fear."—
Convenient handles father found,
Each one a bossy's ear.
The bossy's nose he then immersed—
Oh, halting, useless pen,
How ill ye serve to tell the worst
Of all that happened then!

There came a snort of thund'rous sound—
The bossy wasn't there,
And pa was scattered o'er the ground,
His words remote from prayer.
The barnyard mingled with his clothes
In combination drear,
And blood was flowing from his nose,
And milk from out his ear

Six times he tried; six times, at least.
Oh, dreadful scene, and grim!
Sometimes my pa was on the beast,
Sometimes it was on him.
Oh, best intentions gone astray!
Oh, failures sad and rank!—
The butcher called on us next day,
And bossy never drank!

Thoughtful Man on the Situation

"And now Kentucky will go Insurgent," said the Thoughtful Man, with a sigh.

"I thought that state was counted as certainly Democratic," I remarked.

"It was," he responded, "but haven't you heard that Congressman McKinlay has gone there to speak? He has, and that settles it.
He went to Kansas to preach the golden gospel of Regular Republicanism, and Kansas went so Insurgent that the sole Regular who is left has checked his baggage to Jersey City.
Then he came to California to disseminate that gospel, and it now is almost impossible for an Insurgent to find a Regular here to taunt, while our Duncan, himself, soon will write his title with an 'ex' and tears. It's a plain case; keep your ear to the ground and you soon will hear the reverberating roar of Insurgent thunder from Kentucky.

"I wish it understood, however," the Thoughtful Man continued, "that the Insurgents by no means gained an absolute and unequivocal victory in this state. By heroic exertions we saved Frank Jordan and a constable in Gewhilaken township. I do not know much about the constable, although I am credibly informed that he is Regular, but Mr. Jordan's hand is glad enough to compensate for a multitude of losses. In the night of defeat hope sees that hand and braces up wonderfully. No, the defeat was not absolute. The head, the feet, the legs, the body, the neck, the arms, may be theirs, but that joyous, jubilant, yearn-ful hand still is ours.

"And don't forget," the Thoughtful Man concluded, "to listen for the Insurgent thunder as it booms out of Kentucky."

"I will not," said I, "but I have become so used to such thunder that I may not notice it."

Though he is far from dunce;

And women's hearts grow cold,
And, since he has not callous grown,
His coin he cannot hold.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Cannonism Not Cannon It is evident that the administration is going to throw Uncle Joe Cannon overboard. Probably it cannot throw Cannonism over without jettisoning Uncle Joe himself, but it is not the man that the country particularly desires to be rid of. It is the system that has come to be identified with his name. And what the country particularly does not desire is to have the old system perpetuated with a new exemplification of it in the speaker's chair. That is the danger. The interests do not hesitate to consign to the junk pile any statesman, however serviceable he may have been, who has worn himself to tatters in their service. It will be well to be on the watch lest some man publicly unknown, but foreknown to the interests, be suddenly exalted to high station. Cannonism has been much abated through insurgency, but it is likely that final victory will be won only when the House of Representatives has a speaker elected from outside its own membership working under rules for the transaction of public business non-partisanly laid down.

Present Primary Not the Ultimate Our direct primary law is crude. It is ponderous. It is not the ultimate thing. It must somehow be simplified. We have not found the best way of bringing candidates before the people. The number of offices to be filled by general election must be reduced. What if we were to follow the plan of the government of the United States and elect a chief executive and let him choose all the other state officers? It does not work badly with the nation. Would it with a state? It simplifies the matter of elections. If the direct primary were concerned only with governor and lieutenant-governor, members of congress and of the legislature, it would be possible for the people of the state and districts to make intelligent choice of candidates. It is not now. Why attempt to do at all what we cannot do at all well? The convention system of representative government failed because it failed of representing the will of the people. The convention became a bargain counter. It destroyed free government. The new system is better. It does represent, but at what a cost of effort, time and money! Will the people continue to rise to participate in the contest as they did this time? Is it not now the "new broom" that sweeps clean only when new? The Stetson primary bill of 1907 combined the best features of the direct primary with the best features of the convention, allowed the people to instruct at the polls wherever they had instructions to make, but left delegates free where the people had none to give. It might have proven better. We may ultimately come to something of the sort, but this much is evident: Our present system must be simplified.

Consider the Case Of A. R. Spalding Election of United States senator by direct vote of the people never received a harder knock than that given it by A. R. Spalding August 16, 1910. Not one voter in a hundred who "advised" the legislature to elect Spalding to the United States senate had, a month before he voted, even seen the name unless he saw it stamped upon a base ball. The sporting fraternity probably knew that there was such a man, but no one of these, even, had so much as a hint as to his fitness for a seat in the counsels of a great nation. He appeared before no audiences, he made no speeches, he has manifested no interest in public affairs. It is not known from anything that he has ever done or said, or anything that has ever been done or said for him, that he is anything more than a very pleasant gentleman who has made some hundreds of thousands of dollars as a manufacturer and vendor of sporting goods. Was it by such a test of fitness that a Clay, a Webster, a Benton or even a George C. Perkins came to sit in the most potential deliberative body on earth?

And yet tens of thousands cast their ballots for this man, "advising" the legislature to choose him to fill the highest office within the gift of any state! And who vouched for him? No one but the "organization" push of San Diego, as bad a "bunch" of Southern Pacific politicians as this state affords. The only reason for bringing Spalding out was to serve as "angel" to help secure the nomination of Leroy Wright in the fortieth senatorial district and, unfortunately for the state, it accomplished its purpose. Word was passed "down the line" and more than 50,000 "citizen sovereigns" swallowed the "dope" without looking at it. Could anything more absurd be looked for outside an asylum for incurables? This is not saying that Mr. Spalding may not be the fittest man in California to be United States senator. We merely call attention to the fact that no man outside of San Diego has so much as an inkling as to whether Spalding is fit or not. Those who voted for him did so "unsight and unseen" and thereby betrayed their unfitness to be trusted with the ballot.

The Republican State Convention It is probable that by the time this issue of The California Weekly reaches its readers most of the Republican county conventions will have been held, and delegates will have been elected to the Republican state convention. Some of the delegates may be loth to attend, being under the impression that, inasmuch as there are no state officials to be nominated, there will be nothing to do worth while. No error of judgment could prove more serious. The Republican party is, and is likely to remain, in control of the government of California. Therefore whatever interest controls the Republican party will control the state. There will be a sharp, active fight for control of the state convention and of the state committee it will select. That committee, for the next two years at least, in all matters that affect California in relation to the administration at Washington, will speak in the name of the Republicans of California, and it is important that it speak in the name of the newer Republicanism and not the old. All during Theodore Roosevelt's administration the federal brigade in this state was almost a unit against Roosevelt and the Roosevelt policies. Such a condition ought not to exist. It need not. If progressive Republicanism does its duty the state committee can be made progressively Republican. That committee can voice the sentiments of the people rather than of a corporation-dominated political machine. For the first time in many years freedom is within our grasp. Shall we make the most of it?

A Ringing Platform A platform made after the candidates have all been nominated is not worth a whoop except for a whoop, but a whoop from California may sound good to Republican insurgency in many eastern states, and especially in Wisconsin, where Senator La Follette is having the fight of his life. Candidates have mainly run and been nominated on the Lincoln-Roosevelt platform. On that they will stand or fall. A bad platform might embarrass our candidates, but would not be obligatory upon them. No candidate nominated at the polls will resign his candidacy because he cannot stand upon the platform the state convention may adopt, and yet a good platform, a progressive platform, a platform that rings true, will give life and zeal to the campaign before the people. It will be a part of the duties of the delegates to the state convention to see to it that the voice of California is heard over the mountains clear and true and strong. It has been a long time since it has been.

A Little Self-Felicitation The Watchman notes with what he hopes will be looked upon as a pardonable pride that the banner Johnson county of the state, so far as unofficial returns indicate it, is the county of Tulare, in which The Watchman upheld the cause of a free Republicanism for twenty straight years. Of the 1464 primary Republican votes cast in that county, 1236, or 85 per cent, were cast for Hiram W. Johnson. And the particular community in that county which cast the highest percentage of votes for Johnson, 91 per cent, was Tulare City and adjoining precincts where The Watchman fought, bled and nearly died for Right Things. Whenever a newspaper man finds an indication that the work he has done really counted for something it is hard for him to be perfectly humble and abstain from all self-felicitation. 'Rah for Tulare!

Is Taft Learning Who His Friends Are? The President has been slow to learn that which should have been obvious from the start, that among the Bourbon element in his own party is a bad place to look for friends to help on the Roosevelt policies, to which the President had committed himself, or for progressive Republican legislation. The slogan of Bourbonism is, "Play your strongest cards, take every trick no matter how you take it, the people be damned." For a year and a half the President has surrounded himself with men of that ilk because they happened to be in control of the machinery of his party, and uneasy has rested the presidential head in consequence. It begins to look as though there may be sifting into the presidential understanding some inkling of what these Republican Bourbons have been doing to him. They have led him into treating the insurgents outrageously, and yet all the good legislation that has been had was forced upon a reluctant congress by the insurgent uprising. Under which banner, Mr. President? You cannot fight La Follette in Wisconsin and Sherman in New York. You cannot stand with Roosevelt before the nation and with the Foraker crowd in Ohio. You cannot be at once insurgent and standpatter. You must make up your mind who your friends are and make your political bed with one side or other for better or for worse. The conflict is irrepressible. Better make your choice, and do it now. You will find the door of progressive Republicanism thrown open wide enough to admit you, but not at the eleventh hour, not after the interests have gotten all they want and have prevented all they hope to.

We Do Not Want Taft And Roosevelt To Fight There are those who would love to see a fight between President Taft and former President Theodore Roosevelt. They would go farther and pay more to see it than anybody went or paid to see the "contest" between the grizzly and the gorilla at Reno; but it would be no more in the public interest than was the Reno combat. What the public welfare demands is that these two strong men shall work in accord in the future as they have in the past, that they shall join hands for a progressive Republican policy, for a policy that will give to capital and acquisitive ability all the opportunity they need and, at the same time, work toward a better, a more equal and more just distribution of the common earnings and toward a better safeguarding of our common heritage. The President's purposes have been fine, none better. His one mistake, which came near to being fatal to his administration, has consisted in placing party regularity above the common welfare and accepting party bosses as his advisers merely because they were in possession of the machinery of party. It is not too late for him to have a house cleaning. Ballinger and Hitchcock, Aldrich and Cannon, Sherman and the New York machine, must go and the President must stop fighting La Follette and Cummins. The country wants Taft to make so good a president that there will be no need to recall Theodore Roosevelt to the presidential chair, no need to break with a not unwholesome third term tradition, but if the President fail, if he continues to fight his friends and take counsel of his enemies, that third term tradition will prove no more of an impediment to Roosevelt than a paper hoop to a circus rider.

A Short Chapter Of League History

In the light of the recent splendid triumph a short chapter of history on how the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League came into being may not be devoid of interest. During the legislative session of 1907, E. A. Dickson represented the Los Angeles Express at the legislature. He came up full of the City Club idea that had worked so well at Los Angeles. He wanted to see other cities establish such clubs and then federate them for the common interest. Chester H. Rowell was also at Sacramento. The editor-in-chief of this paper was then editing the Sacramento Union. Many conferences were held at lunch or dinner, in twos or threes, and the idea was well threshed out. The advice of others was taken. It was finally agreed that if Dickson would have invitations sent out by the City Club to prominent reform Republicans a conference would be held at Los Angeles. This was called for May 16, 1907. Only Rowell of Fresno, G. B. Daniels of Oakland, T. C. Hocking of Modesto and The Watchman went down. A meeting was held with selected members of the City Club that day, but Rowell had to go to Santa Barbara to lecture that night, Daniels had to go to San Diego, and only Hocking and The Watchman could stay over until the next day for a fuller discussion. The Watchman put in his time until the next day in drafting a platform of principles that might contain everything that anybody could want in a reform platform with the expectation that much would be cut out of it. Much was cut out, but enough remained, with some patching up at the second day's conference, to serve for a platform of principles. But the meeting was not thought to be sufficiently representative of the progressive republicanism of the state and an adjournment was taken to Oakland, where, in August, the organization was perfected, the tentative platform was reaffirmed and officers chosen. All of which shows what tall aches (for bad politicians) from little toe-corns may grow. It wasn't much of a beginning, but it served. It has done its work. It is now the Republican party of California. The party has been regenerated from within.

Keep An Eye On New Hampshire

The Middle West spoke a while ago. California sent greetings the sixteenth of August. New Hampshire holds state primaries September 6th, and there is just about as hot a fight on in the Old Granite state against Gallingerism as there has been in this state against Herrinism. New Hampshire has not been less under the domination of the Boston & Maine than California has been under that of the Southern Pacific. The fact is that a splendid fight for freedom is going on from Maine to California. Keep an eye on New Hampshire.

That Bugaboo Of Campaign Cost

It will be remembered that Senator Frank Flint declined to enter the lists for re-election to the United States senate on the ground that, being a man of moderate means only, he could not afford so expensive a campaign as it would be necessary for him to make, so he took his family and went to Europe to avoid the expense. Now comes John D. Works, who made all the campaign that any man of reputation ought to have to make in order to come fairly before the people, and avers that his campaign expenses do not amount to one thousand dollars. Of course if he had been "angel" for a questionable batch of political odd jobs men he could easily enough have multiplied the expenditure by twenty or thirty, but he did all that any man who has a reputation to begin with needs to do and all that Frank Flint would have needed to do to make his candidacy. If a man expects to buy a seat in the senate, either outright or by financing the campaigns of a lot of legislators, that would be different, but for legitimate campaigning the allowance made by the law is liberal enough. The example set by Judge Works is wholesome and, like Judge Works himself, calls for no apologies.

He Got Things, Also the Axe

James McLachlan probably estimates the patriotism of his constituents several notches higher than he did before the primary election. He made his campaign squarely on the issue that he had gotten more good things for his district than any other member of congress that district ever had and he demanded to know of them what more they had a right to ask. The answer came in no uncertain tones. It was: "We want what is right for state and nation and our favor for wrong policies is not to be bought with 'Things.'" So, despite all the "Things" McLachlan had gotten for them they gave him the axe because he got them at the price of subserviency to baneful interests. The standards of the people are higher than the standards of the men who have held office to represent the people. The reason why is not far to seek. The people did not select those officers. They were selected by a political machine whose political morals were those of grafters and the tenderloin. McLachlan's own standards would have been higher had he looked to his constituents, rather than to the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, for preferment. Few men can prove better than their creator. Changed creators will give us changed men. What insurgency shall we not now see from McLachlan, Smith, Needham and Kahn!

SOMETHING BROKE

Some Queer Instances

It is not to the discredit of those who drafted the direct primary law that they did not foresee every eventuality. That is a limitation upon all legislation. It affords explanation for the fact that two-thirds of the time of every legislature is devoted to revamping old measures with the view of trying to make them fit. The worst tailor that ever was made a better fit than the best legislator who undertook to cut a new law out of whole cloth, and our direct primary bill will need a deal of tucking and padding, taking in and letting out of seams, when the legislature meets. One of the most serious defects, and one that it would seem might have been foreseen, is the ease with which candidates on one ticket may become the nominee of the opposing party which fails to put up a candidate. Marshall Black defeated Jim Rea for the senatorial nomination on the Republican ticket in the twenty-eighth district, but quite a few Democrats wrote in Rea's name on their ticket and now Rea proposes to run as a Democrat. There are instances where a few votes cast for a Republican or a Democrat on the Socialist ticket will put into the field candidates who have been defeated in their own parties as being unfit to represent them. At such a time as this, wherein party counts for relatively little and the real issue is one of good political morals against bad, this comes to be a serious defect and the next legislature should fix a minimum number of votes to nominate in any case, say as many as is required to constitute a political party, three per cent of the total vote cast in the state or any legal subdivision thereof. That would lessen if it did not remedy the difficulty.

The Case of Frank Jordan

Frank Jordan probably could not be elected to any office in Alameda county. Few in Alameda county have confidence either in his discretion or his integrity of character, and yet Republicans of that county voted heavily to foist this man on the state as Secretary of State. He has probably received a plurality of the votes cast for a Republican nominee for that office, although it will take the official count to determine the fact. It is a nomination not fit to be made. His nomination makes it almost incumbent upon Mr. Charles F. Curry to go on the ticket for that office by petition. Had it not been for the fact that Jordan did politics for him, and he for Jordan, at the primaries, Mr. Curry might be induced to make the venture. He could beat Jordan for his present office and it were a hundred times better that he should. It is thought that Mr. O'Brien was defeated through his given name chancing to be "Florence," many non-suffragettes conceiving that the candidate must be a woman, all of which goes to show that there are no end of stupid people in this world. Frank Jordan is an unequalled glad-hander, and it was that, with the Curry influence and a mistaken notion of local loyalty to a home candidate, that has probably given him a nomination that will prove a heaviness to the ticket and a misfortune to the state.

Free Government Within the Party

Considerable anxiety is felt as to the character of the state committee of the Republican party to be constituted by the forthcoming state convention. A good deal depends on it. But bear this in mind: If the state convention does not constitute a good state committee it will be its own fault and not the fault of another. Heretofore the fault, if there has been a fault, has laid, not with the Republican party or the Republican convention, for neither party nor convention constituted the party committee at all, but with the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, with the result that when George C. Pardee was nominated for governor his committee was against him and in favor of the other man. No such conditions need happen this time. At last the government of the party will be representative of the party. It is a great achievement and among the very best results flowing from the direct primary law. All that the people need is to make use of the mechanism of party management placed in their hands.

Publicity An Injury

Mr. Barnes, the boss of Albany, New York, wants peace. It is his opinion that the business men want peace, political peace, that blissful condition of the American electorate that encourages voters to doze and nod, an imbecile smile of contentment playing over their features while the politicians and the interests go through their pockets as often as they have anything in their pockets worth going through them for. Now comes that arch disturber, that sensation maker, that butter-in, that Bwano Tumbo late of Africa, and sets the people of the empire state all by the ears and the politicians to fighting for thier lives! Also for that daily graft by which they do live. And he comes declaring that the "old guard," the guard that watched the police while their associates looted the strong box, will be given all the fight they want. But Mr. Barnes and his associates do not want any fight at all. They are men of peace. They do not wish to have the people of New York all stirred up. All they want is to be let alone in the operation of a representative form of government that long since ceased to represent anybody but the looters. There is to be some mighty interesting reading in the news from New York for the next few weeks and the probability is that the "old guard" will become the rear guard if it does not find itself under guard.

Greetings To One of the most strenuous battle grounds of the year is Wisconsin. Senator La Follette lette is fighting for re-election to the United States senate and against him are all the powers of plutocracy, of darkness and of the administration at Washington. La Follette is the father of insurgency. He began it. For two years in the United States senate he fought for a hearing. The traditions of the chamber were made the most of to smother him, but he would not be smothered. Those who sat on him in the senate found him in their own states at the earliest opportunity holding their records up to their own people. That was discourteous and Honorable Senators did not like it. La Follette was "hurting himself," they affirmed as they nursed their own wounds, but he got a hearing. Perhaps he has hurt himself. He has so thrown himself into the fight against special interests that he is reported to have consumed what of fortune he had gotten together and is now practically penniless. Witness therefore a penniless man fighting all the money that any possible use can be found for together with the moral influence of the Taft administration that looks upon La Follette as a thorn in its own flesh. He is getting help. Cummins and Dolliver, Bristow and Beveridge, are all stumping Wisconsin. The prayers of progressive Republicans should go with him and, some of their dollars, too.

SHEAR WIT

"My dear," said the young husband as he took the bottle of milk from the dumb waiter and held it up to the light "have you noticed that there's never any cream on this milk?" "I spoke to the milkman about it," she replied, "and he explained that the company always fill their bottles so full that there's no room for cream on top."—Everybody's Magazine.

There is a story of a man who thought he had struck oil on his land and hastened to carry a bottle of the promised treasure to a chemist for analysis. At the moment of departure from his home he was hurried and took the first bottle at hand, for this is the notice he received in due time from the chemist: "I find no trace of petroleum. You have struck salad dressing."—Exchange.

THE WATER QUESTION

AS AFFECTING THE EAST SIDE BAY CITIES

By GEORGE E. BURLINGAME

The attention that is being given to the water situation by the people of Alameda county could hardly be directed toward a question of more intimate and far-reaching as well as immediate importance.

The supply is now insufficient under most favorable conditions, with one or two dry years conditions would be little less than calamitous, much of the water now supplied is not what it should be, and the cost to the consumer is exorbitant. The present distributing system is in a large measure inadequate both for domestic use and for fire protection. The present company appears to be incapable of doing anything to meet the present emergency, or to provide for normal growth of the community in the future. In fact, its plans are to make the present meagre supply take care of the increasing population for four years to come.

Something must be done.

It must be done at once.

The Bay Cities Company's Offer

At this opportune moment the Bay Cities Water Company offers itself as the solution of this perplexing problem, and some of the property holders are accepting it at its face value. It is right, however, that we should weigh this question before we consign our future to it.

The Bay Cities company says, through its solicitors and advocates, that it has good water from a mountain source, and plenty of it, that it is going to put in an up-to-date plant and an efficient distributing system, and that it proposes to put in its plant as soon as a certain specified number of gallons of its water is signed for.

This is what its solicitors say. Authoritatively the company says nothing of the kind. Its contracts make no mention of the quality of the water or the source from which it will be obtained, the nature of the supplying system, nor the size or distribution of any of its mains, the conditions under which it will proceed with the installation of its plant, nor, in fact, that it will install it at all, even though every property holder in the east side bay cities signs its contracts. In fact, it fails to give any detail whatsoever except its schedule of water charges. It has, moreover, maintained dense secrecy before the public in all the essential details.

The attempt has been made time after time to secure even the barest outline of the Bay Cities company's proposition authoritatively, but they have absolutely refused to commit to writing one detail of the plan they are advertising so widely by word of mouth.

Questions That Are Not Answered

The obvious question is, if the Bay Cities Water Company are acting in entire good faith, why should they so consistently refuse to bind themselves? If they mean to bring in water from Mt. Hamilton, why haven't they said so? If they mean to install a new distributing system, no pipe to be less than four inches, why doesn't the contract so state? If they know they have the water and know they can and will give the service, and know they will begin to install their plant immediately upon signing up 5,000,000 gallons per day, there is no mention of their intention to do this in their agreement.

Though this be madness, there is method in it. The well authenticated fact seems to be that the rights to Mt. Hamilton water are so completely involved in other ownerships that the Bay Cities company could not bring a supply from this source no matter how tightly they bound themselves to do so.

But, taking the Bay Cities proposition at its face value, supposing it actually does all its advocates and solicitors say it will do, and further all the things they imply it will do and won't do, and indeed all the things that its most optimistic follower would like to have it do; as a common sense, good of the community proposition, would the coming of the Bay Cities Water Company help us out of the hole or help us further in?

Assuming, for the sake of argument, that competition between the two companies were possible, that the Peoples' company would meet the Bay Cities price and remain in business: We have two systems of mains in the street doing the service of one. Double investment and double upkeep, to say nothing of our city streets being mangled and torn up by two companies.

If the Bay Cities supply half of the people that means half of the Peoples' company's income eliminated. Still assuming the impossible, that there continues to be active competition, the time must come when the Peoples' company will demand interest on their plant and operating investment. Their only customers are the property holders; their only source of income is the property holder; it is not hard therefore to answer the question of who will pay this interest.

But competition is clearly impossible. What, then, obtains—the elimination of one company or the consolidation of the two. Now what is involved in elimination? We naturally assume the elimination of the Peoples: (1) Total loss of their distributing system; (2) Practical loss of local reservoirs and pumping stations; (3) Heavy depreciation in value of the greater part of, if not all their other holdings. (See Schussler's theory.)

By elimination from the field of supplying water to the Alameda county cities the Peoples' loss in actual value would be conservatively fifty per cent. What does this mean? Forty-nine and nine-tenths per cent of an incentive to sell to the Bay Cities, which in all likelihood would happen, or rather some stronger company would consolidate the two and take over both properties.

Let the issue be not confused. The Peoples' Water Company will not be eliminated by a simple twist of the wrist. The logic of the question proves otherwise and the universal experience bears out the logic. Competition of natural monopoly in this day and age has never amounted to more than very brief temporary and scanty advantage to the people. A million dollars is too much of a fighter to allow any good or advantage to come on account of a slight to it.

Interest on Two Investments

There would, unquestionably, be consolidation of the two companies. The Cities then would find that they had to pay interest on two investments. This proposition seems quite clear, that the legal basis of fixing rates is the cost of the plant with little regard to whether the same service might not be rendered better with an investment half as great judiciously placed. Every indiscretion, every mistake, every manipulation, every tangible absurdity becomes an asset upon which the company can legally collect interest from the community. Do not hold up the Bay Cities schedule of rates to disprove this. It is a very unsophisticated business man who does not know that he must make a sacrifice to gain entrance into a profitable field. He makes the sacrifice with the fixed intention of reimbursing himself after he has a foothold. Ten years is not a lifetime, nor fifty per cent of the property holders the whole community.

Suppose, however, it is a fact, what they now maintain, that they do not want the Peoples' plant, that they mean war to the knife and the knife to the hilt. We will assume that this Bay Cities company installs its system and is able, through larger financial backing in a fight to finish competition with the Peoples' company to cut rates to the unsigned consumers sufficiently to put the Peoples' entirely out of business. After the war is over, what then? Can anyone be so bold as to assume that the Bay Cities monopoly will refrain from using its monopolistic advantages and reimburse itself for all past efforts, with a liberal handful for good measure? If such a thing as this did happen it would be the opening act of the millennium, and we should require no more water. The situation as it would work out (from worldly standards) would be this: The company, impoverished by cut-throat competition, would raise the rates among the unsigned consumers—in fact, we have a veiled threat to that effect in the hint by the Bay Cities spokesman, Col. Ogden, that his company was not concerning itself about the "foolish virgins" who failed to take advantage of the opportunity to fill their lamps now.

The signers of contracts would have the happy privilege of using water at the old rate until the contract had expired; then the community would be in a typically private-monopoly-ridden state, somewhat worse than the present symptoms of the same disease.

The question is a grave one and the solution of it is not to be arrived at without careful consideration, and consideration, first of all, of the fundamental questions involved.

Water supply is a natural monopoly. Sustained competition is impossible. The question is, should this monopoly remain in private hands or should it come into the hands of the public?

Some Municipal Ownership Statistics

Probably three-fourths of the people of Alameda county believe in municipal ownership of the water supply. It is also probable that the faith of three-fourths of these is not of the aggressive, initiative variety, that they have lingering doubts as to whether municipal ownership is really worth a lively interest. The following facts should reassure them:

Of the sixteen water plants in operation in the United States in 1800 fifteen were private. Of the thirty-eight cities having a population of over 100,000 in 1900, eight remain which are supplied with water from private companies; the population of the thirty cities having their own plants comprises ninety per cent of the population of the thirty-eight. The public ownership cities average a lower death rate from typhoid fever, two of the nine private companies in 1906 were among the nineteen having the lowest death rate, seven of the nine were among the nineteen having the highest death rate. As to net cost of water: an average of twenty-one cities situated in Pennsylvania, Illinois and Maine shows a situation as follows: The total revenue per family (including hydrant rentals, street service, etc.) per year under private ownership is $13.00. An average of twenty-one cities situated similarly to those above shows a total cost per family under complete municipal ownership of $3.80 a year. The Philadelphia water works turn into the public treasury $1,302,000, or about four per cent a year on the value of the plant above expenditures, though the average receipts are but 3c per thousand gallons.

We also have near at hand the striking examples of Los Angeles, Portland and Seattle. In our own case, we are now paying 35c per thousand gallons. Allowing a liberal margin for leeway over the estimate of City Engineer Marsden Manson, of San Francisco, of the cost of delivery of water from Hetch Hetchy, the cities on this side of the bay can, by joining San Francisco in this supply, deliver pure mountain water to the consumer for an actual cost of 10 cents per thousand gallons.

As to the character of municipal plants the National Civic Federation's report has this to say: "Those who imagine that municipal undertakings do not put in as large and up-to-date units of machinery and introduce as great labor-saving devices as do private plants should visit the pumping stations of Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, Boston, etc. * * * * * they will compare at any time with the best that private water works can show in any part of the world.

Advantages of Municipal Ownership

The explanation of the advantage and economy of public ownership as evidenced by the instances cited lies in the following, that with municipal ownership there are:

- No dividends on watered stock;
- No dividends on actual investment;
- No lawyers and lobbyists, no graft money, no entertaining of officials;
- No soliciting of business, no advertising or publication bureaus;
- No interest, or if interest at all usually a lower rate than that at which private companies can borrow;
- No salaries of inactive corporation heads;
- Less tendency to waste and destroy;
- No stocks to gamble with;
- Honest accounts, less fraud, corruption and bribery.

Municipal ownership is economically and ethically right, and because it is right it will ultimately obtain. The question with the cities of Alameda county is how can we take care of immediate, pressing necessity and at the same time secure at the earliest possible moment our own water system. The situation is indeed pressing, but we cannot afford, in our desperation, to throw discretion to the winds and hastily seize upon the first thing that offers. Let us admit that the situation demands drastic measures, that in the emergency we must make some sacrifice. It is certainly the part of wisdom not to sacrifice all when less is possible.

The advent of the Bay Cities Water Company would be about as perfect a calamity to municipal ownership as a public service corporation could desire.

Three Evident Essentials

The three essentials in getting a municipal water supply are: (1) the people must want it; (2) they must have the money to get it; (3) there must be a source which can be reasonably secured.

Taking (1): The argument of the Bay Cities company in its recent memorandum to the City Council of Alameda is a most valid one, that the tendency of the community is to neglect to act until it is compelled to. That is, a crisis is about the only thing that will stir us to interest and with the present emergency cared for we would probably settle back into the old rut and forget the idea and the essential advantages of a municipally owned supply.

Furthermore, the attitude of the private company is to discourage in every possible way any movement toward public ownership. It has good interest paying property. It therefore has no desire to sell to the city. With the growth of the public ownership movement capital is finding it more and more difficult to find fat investment and tends to cling tenaciously to whatever good propositions it may have. The coming of the Bay Cities would distinctly be a blow to initiative of the public in this direction.

(2) Suppose, however, we remain alive to the question in spite of everything and still vigorously want our own supply? How are we going to get it? Wait until we save enough money? Of course not, we will issue bonds. Suppose we issue bonds for the purpose of installing a water supply that does not take care of the existing private investment, who is going to buy the bonds? It is a fixed policy with capital to refuse to go to the assistance of municipalities until local investment is taken care of.

(3) This means that existing companies will have to be bought out before the cities can go further. We need only look across the bay to San Francisco to recognize the seriousness of this phase of the question and the wisdom of refusing to lay ourselves liable to such tribute.

Opposition to Hetch Hetchy

There is now through the agency of the Hetch Hetchy an opportunity for the bay municipalities to get out from under the very costly experience of having to buy out private interests at exorbitant prices. By allowing our water stress to be alleviated now by a new company we stand a chance of losing this opportunity. That is, our right to the Hetch Hetchy stands a chance of being rescinded, the existing water companies are doing everything in their power to bring this about and unless the people of the cities about San Francisco bay exert themselves actively in its behalf it will be lost, and once lost the opportunity will never occur again.

Not only do the Bay Cities company know this, but also the Peoples' company know it, and the Spring Valley company know it, and they know that the entrance into the field of a new company is an asset in their favor to eliminate the much more to be feared Hetch Hetchy. They have, therefore, shown little interest in the proposition that would seem to be of vital importance to them. It is not that they love the Bay Cities company more, but that they love the Hetch Hetchy less.

The Bay Cities company, I say, knows that once the municipalities are committed to the Hetch Hetchy the rights which it accumulated with the idea of finding an easy customer and a handsome profit in San Francisco through the agency of the Ruef-Schmitz regime, will be useless and worthless. It proposes, therefore, with commendable thrift, to forestall the Hetch Hetchy and fasten its properties securely upon the east side cities, well knowing that if this action itself does not do away with the cities' rights in Hetch Hetchy, the cities will be compelled to purchase their properties before further development can be made.

The Bay Cities company cannot, of course, be blamed for desiring to get rid of their assumed water rights which they went to considerable trouble to secure and in which they have considerable money tied up.

The question of whether they can be blamed for securing these rights with the idea of selling them to the cities at a handsome profit is a moral rather than a commercial question. This plan of forestalling the public in the natural resources of the country has long been attractive to certain aggregations of capital.

The Bay Cities company cannot be blamed, perhaps, for framing their contracts in such a way as to place no obligation upon themselves and every obligation upon the signer. They may not be blamed, perhaps, for slipping in a joker whereby a man cannot use water from his own well without paying the Bay Cities for it.

Perhaps, I say, the Bay Cities cannot be blamed. At any rate, wherever the blame may be placed it is the public that has to suffer.

THE hair-breadth escapes of Jed were infinite in variety and number. The frontier was full of perils to life and limb, but was it more so than the streets of a modern city? With the automobile, the street cars passing each other at high speed, the motor cycle and the carelessly driven express wagon, and with no place to play except in the street with all its wheeling life, what greater risk had the frontier child than has the child of the metropolis every day in the year? Life has come to be rated at little value, and each must be the custodian of his own if he would save it. It is little enough of heed that others will give to it. If the reader doubt this let him watch for a quarter of an hour the people crossing Market or Kearny at Market and Kearny in San Francisco or Broadway at Fourteenth in Oakland. One may there read fear in faces as he might not on the firing line.

In summer chinks were taken out of the foundation course of logs under the cabin that the space beneath the floor might be ventilated and, one day, Jed saw a copper-head crawl under at one of these spaces. While his older cousin was gone for the rifle Jed threw himself upon his stomach on the swept dooryard with arms outstretched directly in the path of the snake that he might watch where it went. Meantime, the mate to the first snake came tagging after and crawled over Jed's arm between shoulder and elbow not half a foot from the boy's face, but passed on to join its mate without harming the boy in the least. Presently both of the snakes fell a victim to the rifle. Nothing makes a finer mark for a ricocheted bullet than a coiled snake. It goes through him again and again.

But Jed's most dangerous enemy was the polliwog. With sleeves rolled up he spent hours trying to catch them as they wriggled in the pools at the crossing, or else Jed built dams to pen them in. Half the time he was soaking wet, with the final result that rheumatic fever caught him and a great abscess developed on his arm, eating the bone partly away and, for five straight years, consuming the greater part that Jed consumed. It was ever getting hurt, healing up only to break out in a new place, making Jed white, undersized, lacking in strength and endurance, causing him weeks and weeks of acute suffering.

What Jed disliked more than anything else about it was that he could not fight so well on account of that bad arm, and it lasted him all through his fighting age, from nine to fourteen. It handicapped him on the ball field, for he could throw the ball neither so far nor so straight as other boys of his age, and if he strained his lame arm ever so little there were days or weeks of carrying it in a sling. Such events have an effect upon character. Perhaps nothing else had greater influence upon Jed than that. Although he ventured in as often as he could this weakness tended to leave him on the outside of the more rugged enterprises of his fellows, and it accustomed him to defeat, than which few things can be worse.

Fortunately for him Jed's playfellows showed him little mercy because of his infirmity. If they had babied him he might have been and remained a baby half his days, but they did not. Like other healthy, active "kids" they were savages and if Jed was rebellious they would threaten to hurt his sore arm if he didn't watch out, and that usually had the effect of making him watch out, but not always. If encroached upon too far he fought anyhow he could, with kicks and scratches like a girl, if not with blows man fashion that he could not so effectively deliver.

If these uninteresting details are set down it is because the purpose of the "Recollections of Jed," is, if possible, to reveal something of the mind of a child to those who ought to know it that they may the better shape the growing timber in their own hands. They have no other justification.

Jed's handicap, therefore, accustomed, if it did not reconcile, him to defeat. If the reader will suffer his own mind to run back over his childhood that he may form some estimate of the daily efforts to excel someone else in something, in plainer terms, to "beat" someone at some game, he may be able to form some idea of what part competitive play has in human development. It is a good half of it. The case of the handicapped competitor is lamentable. It deserves, though it ought never to receive, commiseration. Sympathy accentuates and confirms the evil consequences.

Now the weapon of the weak is deceit. It is that which makes the straightest woman rather more indirect in her methods than the most circuitous man, and what enables her to twist the strongest man around her little finger. Jed's weakness made him circuitous in his methods. If he got tired of school and wanted to go home or to stay at home the boys hurt his arm so he could not go. If he did go to school and wanted to go home at the afternoon recess his arm conveniently pained him so that he could not study. If he wanted anything that another had, and could not take it by force as others did, he watched his chance to steal it. From stealing successfully some object of no value the step was not far to stealing something that did have value, but that belongs to another chapter, only stopping here to suggest that a careful observer will be able to find a reason why for every form of moral delinquency in children if he will look. If the cause be found it may be removed and the child saved from ruin if not from ignominy.

But about "Old Crop Ear." The gray wolves usually, but not always, followed the buffalo westward as settlements crowded them back toward the Rocky Mountains. Now and again a pair of them would take up their abode in a settlement fairly to haunt it. This happened to the settlement on the Serpentine. Nothing like a gray wolf had been seen for several years when Wesley Blair, on the North Fork, found a yearling colt killed and half devoured. A few days later, on the South Fork, one of the Marsh boys saw one wolf kill a yearling heifer while his mate looked on. The wolf seemed as big as the heifer. Within a week as Chet Taylor was driving up his cows in the shade of evening these wolves dashed into the herd as they neared a ravine, tore open the throat of a calf before his very face and held to their prey and feasted on it while he watched.

The neighbors turned out for a wolf hunt with all the dogs in the country, but although they jumped up and killed a few coyotes they saw nothing of the pair of grays. One of the Blair boys, out for prairie chickens with his shotgun, surprised the pair in a cove and blew the ear off of one of them with a charge of shot at short range. Some young stock was killed over on the bottom of the Sandy, half a dozen miles away. The wolves were seen at different times and places and all agreed that one of them had one good ear and only a stub of another. They were shot at a number of times, but always at long range and with no success. Hogs were killed in the blackjack country the other side of the Sandy. They were seen there, too, "Old Crop Ear," leading, so their range was evidently a long one.

The spring work was pressing, but in very self defense the settlers felt forced to take a day off and make another hunt. The Blackjack people formed a line and crowded down to the bend of the river. The men on the North fork rounded the head of that stream and swept toward the bend of the Sandy and the men of the South fork did the same. The valley men turned out likewise. There were half a hundred men and more than a hundred dogs, all starting with the dawn. The hope was to drive the beasts out into the broad valley of the Sandy where they would be in plain sight and the hunters would have a fair chance to ride them down and kill them.

Enough coyotes were killed to give the chickens comparative security for that season at least, but it was not until nearly noon that the trail of the grays was struck. They headed for the Blackjack country with the North Fork men at their heels, but by that time the dogs were tired. The line drew in and pressed forward. From the point of the bluffs overlooking the valley the Blackjack men were descried just emerging from the timber on the river and warning was given. It was yet early spring and the grass was not so high that the big fellows could not be seen by the men on horseback. The flanks of the approaching wings met and it did not seem possible that the wolves could escape.

But the wolves could see, too, and began to understand what was up. Hitherto they had trotted contentedly out of rifle shot. Now that they saw horsemen and dogs in front as well as behind them they turned up one of the ravines back toward the direction from which they had come. The country was rough but the North fork men and dogs surrounded the head of the ravine as soon as possible and advanced down it. The dogs came on helter-skelter, big and little, old and young. Instead of flying from them the wolves pitched onto them and killed three or four in the twinkling of an eye, taking the fight out of the others, but the men with rifles did not look good to the wolves, and they ran out of that ravine, turned to the right and up the next, the Blackjack men thundering upon their heels, the South fork men at the head of the ravine and the North fork men gathering in.

This time the South fork dogs went at them with much the same fatalities as in the case of the North fork save that Old Noble and Turk were not so easy. While Turk was getting a dressing down from the female Noble got a grip on her throat and was too powerful to be shaken off. The men sprang from their horses and went to the rescue of their dogs, leaving an opening through which "Old Crop Ear" made his escape back toward the North fork country. Turk's owner dispatched the female wolf with his revolver while Noble held to her throat and Turk to her flank, but, as for "Old Crop Ear," it was now a stern chase in which he distanced dogs and horses. Although they followed him until dark and far out of the country he kept beyond rifle range, and the hunt was only a partial success.

Elder Giddings, a few days after the hunt, was returning from the home of a neighbor by starlight when "Old Crop Ear" sprang into the road in front of him not ten feet away. The elder, pocket knife in hand, backed toward a worm fence at the side of the road, tore from it a rail and backed brandishing it three-quarters of a mile to his own gate, the wolf every instant seeking an opening for an attack. As he drew near to his home his faithful old shepherd dog flew at the wolf only to have his side ripped open and his throat cut in payment for his valor. Instead of the dogs hunting the wolf the wolf hunted the dogs, and more dogs than calves or colts were killed and many farms made dogless.

One of these was that of Oscar Marshman, one of the most prosperous young settlers on the Serpentine, the owner of Turk. Turk came up missing a few days after the Giddings incident and his torn remains were found in the gulch a hundred yards from the house. In the dead of night there had been a furious barking and then silence.

The Blairs had lost their dog, too, and Mrs. Blair, going into the kitchen with a candle, was confronted by "Old Crop Ear," looking in at the kitchen window, his white fangs gleaming and his chops drooling with blood from the throat of a calf he had killed less than ten rods from the door. He was rarely seen at daytime, not infrequently at night, and he became a sort of malign spectre in the minds of the people of the Serpentine where he mainly ravaged, something to frighten naughty children with, not without reason.

Oscar Marshman was out plowing for corn. It was getting late in the season, the 20th of May, to be exact, but he thought he might get in a few acres more with diligence, although the planting had been mainly done. It was one of those mornings such as nature can now and again afford, not too abundantly lest we lose our power of appreciating them; just perfect, that's all.

Oscar was one of the most buoyant of men and Maybel, his wife, was the life of the younger people of the community. Charley was toddling about the house and yard care-free. There had been no rain for a week nor had "Old Crop Ear" been heard from. Perhaps he had been paying his respects to the Blackjack country. Oscar's three sturdy horses, harnessed abreast, were turning the rich brown loam up as easily and as smoothly as though they had been plowing cheese. So overflowing was Oscar with happiness that, as frequently happened, he lifted up his voice in singing, "A health unto the farmer who lives among the hills." God did, seem so good to him and his frontier farm was so much richer, bigger and better than the old one upon which he had spent his boyhood. He was consciously so happy.

Just then Maybel screamed: "Oh Oscar, come quick, I can't find Charley." Oscar was not three hundred yards from the house, just ending the furrow next to the fence. Hastily hitching the horses to the fence he ran to the house to find Maybel white and trembling. "Where was he when you last saw him?" was his first inquiry.

"Why, I only just went to the spring," she said, "and left him toddling after me in the path. I came back in just a minute and he was gone. I have looked everywhere." Yes, everywhere except in heaven.

The spring was not fifty yards from the back gate. The house was built there because of it. The path wound around the end of a wild plum thicket that extended up the gulch a hundred yards or more. It was bordered with sumacs, very dense, through which the pigs and calves, running loose, had made some trails.

Oscar plunged into this thicket, running from end to end and side to side, crashing through with all his power that his eyes might see every square foot of space within the least lapse of time. A passing neighbor was hailed and joined in the search on horseback. The child was not to be found in the gulch.

The neighbor put spurs to his horse and carried the word from house to house. By noon every man and half the women and boys on the Serpentine were sweeping up the ravines that led out from this gulch and out over the terraced hills that bordered the wide bottom of the Sandy. Night came with no trace of the child save that on a thorn far up the gulch was a shred of calico that looked as though it might have been torn from little Charley's dress. A band of Indians having camped on the creek the night before, two or three of the neighbors followed and overtook them, thinking that the child might have been kidnaped, but to no purpose.

Night came on and all the lanterns in the community were brought out and the search continued. A heavy rain storm came up the next day, but through it all an ever-increasing force of men continued the search, until literally every square yard of ground for miles around had been searched. Had the child been taken up to heaven bodily, as was Elijah, his disappearance could not have been more complete.

The search was given over. Oscar Marshman and Maybel, his wife, took up the thread of life as best they could, but the joyousness had gone out of it for both of them. Other sons and daughters were born to them in after years, but none took the place in their hearts of their lost Charley. They seldom left the farm, joined in no festivities, worked like Trojans, prospered in a monetary way but, instead of being buoyant as he ever had been, Oscar became morose and silent, contentious with his neighbors and estranged from them. As for Maybel she seemed to grow more and more large-eyed and silent year by year. She looked at one as a sick animal might. Oscar had taken her to task for want of care, and that had doubled her grief, but she held her peace save when the storm blew hollowly under the eaves and she fancied that, coming down the wind, were the voices of lost children crying into the night. Then her throat ached and her bosom heaved, she laid her silvering head on Oscar's bosom and wept.

One fall, after the prairies had burned over, out in the sandy bottom a good four miles from Oscar Marshman's home, a horseman came upon something glistening white and got off his horse to look at it. It was a part of the skull of a child. It may have been all that remained of Charley, but that was a presumption only. By and by Oscar Marshman sold his farm to a newcomer, auctioned his effects and went away with his family to another state, but the shadow of the "Lost Child of the Serpentine" did not lift from the community life for a' that. The story is still told to little children who tend to wander off, and a sinister spectre of a great gray wolf, with one ear cropped close, trots unhurriedly across the vision of the mind.

The corn had reached the roasting ear stage and was especially attractive to breechy cattle. Jed's father's fences were never quite as effective as they might have been made. The sun, shining in at Jed's chamber window, fell directly across the head of Jed's bed and woke him betimes on sunny summer mornings. The point of danger from cattle was the south fence forty or fifty rods down the road, which skirted the creek bank before and after the big bend. The bend lay to the right and was a hay field.

Jed was told to run down and see if the cattle had disturbed the fence during the night. He started accordingly and, somehow, Old Noble, who was generally either at Jed's heels or just ahead of him, did not follow. Jed had nearly reached the hayfield, quite out of sight of the house when, hearing something crashing through the bushes under the creek bank, he stopped to see what it was. Instantly there sprang into the road directly in front of him "Old Crop Ear."

Jed froze. The wolf stood with his body across the road, but with head turned toward Jed. Jed looked him full in the eyes. They were evil, hungry, sinister eyes never to be forgotten. How long the two stood there looking at each other Jed had no definite idea. For that matter Jed was without ideas. He was not even afraid. He uttered no sound, made no motion, experienced no sensation. He was turned to stone. "Old Crop Ear" must have been of the same opinion, having no stomach for the digestion of a stone boy, for, instead of springing upon the boy and rending him limb from limb, he sprang into the corn. Then Jed came to himself. His feet pattered home and he staggered near to fainting into the presence of his father, too tongue-tied to tell anything except "The wolf."

Meantime "Old Crop Ear" glided through the corn to the melon patch where the chickens were, but had no business to be, swung a big rooster over his shoulder and made for the fence. Jed's father saw him as he sprang upon the fence with his prey. Old Noble saw him, too, and plunged after with a cry of rage. Jed's father turned the boy over to his mother, grabbed the rifle from its peg and hastened after.

For a time he was able to follow by the feathers which the rooster scattered. The trail made directly for the open country, but, at the end of a quarter of a mile, it terminated. The dead rooster lay upon the ground, and the trodden grass gave evidence of a terrific struggle between dog and wolf. Handicapped by the rooster the dog had overtaken the wolf and there had been a fight, but the wolf had made off, with the dog following him and soon the trail was lost in the indistinguishable stubble. For an hour or more Jed's father searched the brush, the creek-side and the open, but he saw nothing and heard nothing of dog or wolf, and went home to breakfast.

Two hours after breakfast "Old Noble" was found whining at the outer gate too weak to get over the fence, bleeding from a dozen vicious cuts and wounds and as near dead as alive. His wounds were washed and stitched. he was tenderly cared for and, in a week or two, was as well as ever. That was the last seen of "Old Crop Ear" in the district of the Serpentine. Whether or not Old Noble succeeded in killing him no one ever knew, for Old Noble could not talk, although he would have had much to say had he been able to. He knew enough. Some thought that, handicapped by the rooster, "Old Crop Ear" had suffered the dog to get such a hold upon him as had crippled him, that he had made off with the dog in pursuit, was finally overtaken and the issue settled. But where? Neither time nor the echoes ever answered.

It is therefore up to the public to say whether they will take the burden upon themselves or shall refuse to take it.

That there is some other solution to the present emergency that will tide us over the period necessary for the development of the Lake Eleanor-Hetch Hetchy supply seems most probable.

We are now paying dividends upon hundreds of millions of gallons of water that run off the water sheds of the Peoples' Water Company untrammelled into the bay. It would seem the part of common sense that we use what we are already paying for before seeking the privilege to pay for more. There is available from the present sources of supply an additional amount of approximately 14 million gallons per day, or nearly 75 per cent over what is now being supplied.

We have a right to look to our city officials and urge upon them serious effort in the matter, at least, before committing ourselves unalterably to the sacrifice of bringing in the Bay Cities supply.

The Moral Issue Involved

There is further the moral issue. We have it in for the Peoples' Water Company, there is no doubt about that. But we may not slap at the Peoples' through the Bay Cities. Any plan which takes no cognizance of the right to reasonable consideration of existing enterprise is immoral and unsquare and wrong. Because the bay community has suffered somewhat from the abuse of power by the existing water company this gives the community no moral right to assume to retaliate. A moral community cannot afford to put itself on the same plane with an immoral corporation.

Let us not confuse the issue. Competition is impossible, private monopoly is insufferable. The time is now ripe to take up and press vigorously the step toward municipal ownership of its water supply by the bay community.

The serious condition of the water situation, its present agitation and interest, is the most effective aid possible to the successful furtherance of this issue. The Hetch Hetchy is now in a critical shape, and being contested every step by the present companies, and vigorous and united and unanimous action by the cities and the people is required to save it to them. By stepping into this now with San Francisco, the east side cities step into a heritage without effort.

If we ignore this opportunity, if we permit an economic monstrosity to fasten itself upon the community, it will be the source of deep regret during all the years to come.

PERSONALIA

The old mahogany desk used by Robert Burns at Ellisland and Dumfries, and at which the poet wrote "Tam o' Shanter," "Auld Lang Syne" and many of his other famous lyrics, was sold in London recently for $3,000. Of unimpeachable pedigree, this relic aroused keen interest. The desks of other famous writers sold much cheaper. One used by Dickens at Tavistock house went for $65.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The State Board of Examiners

Under our original scheme of government the State Controller was made the especial watchdog of the treasury, but at some time or other some controller must have been neglectful of his duties, for the state found it necessary to have a preliminary check upon the action of the controller and from an independent source. Consequently, the governor, secretary of state and attorney-general were constituted a board of audit to examine and approve or reject claims against the state, unless especially excepted by law, before they go to the controller.

As a matter of practice this board does not do any of this auditing. These men have other work to do that commands all their time and attention. Sometimes when a claim is in question, when a matter of policy is involved, meetings of this board are actually held and the issues gone over and a rule laid down, but that seldom happens. The actual work of auditing is done by the assistant secretary of the board and a force of three or four clerks. The assistant secretary's "o. k." is all that the board goes by when two of them certify that the claims are correct. This confidence in the assistant secretary is seldom abused, but a careless or incompetent assistant might easily put through many bills that ought not to be allowed, as he does correct and reject many that are irregular. For the last eight years, or very near it, the state has had in this position, in the person of Mr. Clyde L. Seavey, a very competent and careful official. He is really the State Examiner of claims and that should be the title of his office; he should hold his office by appointment of the governor and the State Board of Examiners should be abolished. It is clumsy, it cannot do the work assigned to it as a board, and there is nothing in administrative government more detrimental than the possession of functions that are not and cannot be performed by those who possess them.

In the days when Markham was governor claims against the state were delayed in their payment for weeks and months because neither the governor nor the attorney-general could be caught at the state capitol to sign the checked-up bills for their audit. The law requires that two out of three shall sign. To facilitate the signing the attorney-general was authorized to perform his service through the deputy stationed at the capitol, but, inasmuch as that did not provide for the signature of the absent governor, the law was so changed as to allow the secretary of the board of examiners to sign when it requires his signature to make two, but he cannot do this if any two out of the four members are in Sacramento. In case any of the members of the board are disqualified for acting, because interested in a claim against the state, the state treasurer may act in his stead.

The secretary of the board of examiners is seldom secretary of the board. The work of the secretary usually falls to the assistant secretary. Section 654 of the Political Code closes by saying that the secretary of the board of examiners, "shall perform such duties, other than secretary, as may be assigned to him by the governor from time to time." This work, "other than secretary," commonly consumes all the time of the secretary and makes him a very busy man. He is virtually outside man for the governor.

Some governors have made the secretary of the state board of examiners their political manager and sometimes this service has been assigned to an alleged "expert" especially employed by the board. Anyhow the secretary is a member of the governor's official family and, if relieved from "doing politics" for his chief, he visits all the state institutions and reports on them to the governor, settles controversies, and is a sort of general agent for the state. The governor needs such a subordinate. There is enough non-political field work for such a man to do to keep him on the go to the extent of a thousand miles per month if not more. He needs to be eyes, ears and hands for the governor.

The secretary of the state board of examiners now receives $3,600 a year, his assistant $3,000 and there are four clerks who receive $1,800 each, and an expert who receives $2,400. The duty of the expert is to attend to the auditing of the accounts for the dependent children's fund, but that will merit a special lesson inasmuch as California's method of aiding dependent children is unique among all the states of the union.

Occasionally the legislature passes an appropriation bill that specifically exempts that appropriation from being audited by the state board of examiners. That should be notice to all concerned that there is a "negro in the woodpile," that someone is being exempt from surveillance who ought to be under surveillance.

There are also certain institutions whose expenditures are not subjected to scrutiny by this board. The state university is one of them. That exemption should not be made. Every claim against the state, of whatever character, should pass through the regular channels of audit, and all state moneys should be deposited in the state treasury and drawn out only upon the Controller's warrant. Even with all these checks upon expenditures errors happen and the public interest suffers. That risk should be reduced to a minimum.

For his own amusement Paul Sorg runs a coach and four between the Holland house and Larchmont. The turnout is about the snappiest thing in New York. And Mr. Sorg, as becomes a very rich man who can afford to take his sport in his own way, is the very glass of coaching form. The other day a party of Western people, unfamiliar with coaching customs, engaged the vehicle for the round trip. The four toppy horses were slashing through the park, and Mr. Sorg, as good whip should, was driving with the tips of his fingers. The sunlight and the keen air and the greenery got into his blood. He turned to the host of the coaching party on the seat behind. "What a perfect day," said Mr. Sorg, genially. "The elements have combined to make us happy." "What?" said the man behind. Mr. Sorg called renewed attention to the scenery and the sun. "My soul expands upon a day like this," said he. "Well," said the man behind, "don't you expand too much. You watch your horses, and we'll pay attention to the elements." Mr. Sorg tells the story on himself, but admits that he drove his team four miles before he was able to laugh.—New York Sun.

Laurier's Dream

AT YELLOWGRASS Sir Wilfred Laurier, in addressing an assemblage of farmers who had gone there from the United States, said: "I have had great dreams. An alliance between the British empire and the American republic would result in a state of world affairs under which not a single shot could be fired without their permission." It is nearly a hundred years since there has been a serious disagreement between these two great English speaking peoples, and it should be a thousand years before there is another. Having disarmed the world, including themselves, except for an international police force, it would only remain to make life worth while and then enjoy it. Not a nightmare by a long chalk!

The Titian Tufted Lady

THOMAS W. LAWSON AFFIRMS that the charms of women were stock in trade in frenzied finance. John Archbold denies the allegation and brands the statement as ridiculous. The ridiculousness of the pious Rockefeller and Rogers resorting to such devices will not be questioned, nor will the substantial truth of Tom Lawson's allegation. While nothing that he ever wrote probably happened just as he wrote it, his picture of The System has been accepted as essentially true in substance if not in detail. It is improbable that if any "Titian Tufted Woman" was available, and likely to prove useful, she was unemployed. Men who swallowed whole menageries of iniquities are unlikely to have strained at such gnats.

How Did They Happen?

ELSEWHERE IN THIS PAPER will be found a well written article showing why fires in forests should not happen; but what the public now desires to know is, how the great forest fires that raged during August came to happen. The Forest Service should make it its business to furnish the public with a full history of each instance. Did these fires originate in cut-over districts belonging to private owners? Were they confined to private lands? Did they originate in forest reserves and were they mainly confined thereto? A full history of all those catastrophes given the fullest publicity cannot fail of being profitable to forest conservation, and the blame should be put where it belongs.

Land Subdivision in England

ALREADY THE LAND TAX FEATURE of the Lloyd-George budget is prompting subdivisions of large land holdings in England. Earl Manvers, in Nottinghamshire, and Earl Carnarvon, at Burton-On-Trent, have placed considerable tracts on the market in subdivisions to suit purchasers of moderate means, the first because he does not favor land taxation and the latter professedly because he believes in the wider dispersal of land anyhow; but it is noticeable that his belief prompted no action on his part until the government arranged to take to itself twenty per cent of the unearned increment. The idea embodied in that budget will find expression in many forms in many lands as humanity comes to appreciate the justness of it. If all the unearned increment belongs to all the people there appears to be no good reason why they should not take to their own uses at least a modest fraction of it.

No Modest Violet He

CERTAIN PROPER PERIODICALS are much incensed because, in his great swing around the circle, Theodore Roosevelt has said "I will, I, I, I," more than a modest man should. It must be confessed that Theodore is no modest violet, hanging his drooping head in humility. If he were he might prove a moral influence, but scarcely a moral power. Nor is he a Christ-like personality, content to start in his own time influences that will be increasingly potential for good as the ages roll on. He is an American statesman who must do the work he has to do here and now, and he is setting wheels to going in the only way he can, by giving the crank a vigorous turn. Those who don't get aboard will get left. This is a militant world, my brethren.

Democrats Decapitated

WHEN TAMMANY WENT TO THE RESCUE of Cannonism in the House, two Georgia representatives, Livingstone and Howard, joined Tammany and helped to save the day for Uncle Joe. Now they wish they had been confined to their rooms with the mumps instead. Their constituents turned them down cold. And yet Uncle Joe didn't make a single speech in all Georgia!

Up From Servitude

OF ALL THE MOVEMENTS of our time there is none other so important to humanity as that which will be commemorated on Monday. Industrial and economic wars have been waged for the right of the individual man to rise. The labor movement is for the right of the human mass to rise as one man, all for one and one for all. There is more of downright brotherhood in this movement than in all other movements combined. It has made mistakes. It will make more of them. As it comes to feel its power it is likely to abuse it. It has done so already. It has had all the power-holding world to set it that example. The future is to them. It is of them that the generations of the future are to be bred. Their line does not die out like that of their employers. Their womanhood does not constitute an aristocracy of intellectual and social childlessness. It is of them and theirs that the nation must live and move and have its being. Therefore, think kindly of those serried ranks as they march by. Also think prudently of the fact that, take the country over, they are three million strong and are to be reckoned with in whatever this nation does or attempts to do.

They Behaved

WE HAD AN IDEA that the Calhoun attorneys could behave if they had to. We surmised that they knew how. When they returned to Judge Lawlor's court they were as demure and respectful as gentlemen at the bar should be. And this notwithstanding that they had converted a jail sentence into a high time regaling themselves with the best a high-living, pleasure-loving city could afford. Did they nevertheless think it over? Did they, after thinking it over, reach the sound conclusion that they had acted outrageously for months and years, abusing the long-suffering lenience of a judge who never once lost self control? Their behavior since being delivered out of jail raises the presumption that they are not the swashbucklers they had seemed, but really did know how to behave. That was something to their credit even if they did not avail themselves of that knowledge. It is reassuring to know that the bar is not barbarian.

The Mayor and Water

Mayor P. H. McCarthy defeated the late proposal to purchase the Spring Valley water plant when the good sense of the community was overwhelmingly for it. That he is now in favor of what he previously opposed should not prompt those who favored such purchase then to oppose it now. The ambition to equal the mayor of this city in wrong-headed stubbornness would ill become the city over whose misfortunes he unfortunately presides. If a renewal of the former proposal of Spring Valley can be obtained, just as before, the plant should be purchased. Failure to purchase that plant on some basis will stand across the path of the city leading to a Sierra or other adequate supply. All financial interests can be counted on to stand together for the inviolability of capital invested in public service corporations. No municipality will be permitted to bankrupt any big water company by establishing a municipal system in competition therewith.

The declaration of the Mayor that the Garfield permit is not worth the paper it is written on exceeds the truth, but the fact that congress neglected or refused to clinch the claim of San Francisco to that source of supply was notice to the city that the Garfield permit was and is at least voidable. The best that can be said of it has been said by former Mayor Taylor as affording the city "good fighting ground," but something more than "good fighting ground" must be had before millions are expended or plans are finally made with that source as the keystone to the arch. It would be foolhardy for the city to do more than needful to preserve its easement from lapsing by reason of lack of due diligence until congress shall have made the grant in fee simple.

The proposal to divert the bonds voted for Hetch Hetchy to the purchase of Spring Valley wears a sinister look in that it implies a covert intent to abandon Hetch Hetchy, which should in no wise be abandoned so long as "good fighting ground" remains, and yet, aside from the unfavorable impression it might create, and particularly on the mind of congress (which might accept such diversion as an implied abandonment of the Garfield permit), the suggestion is not intrinsically bad. It might prove tactically an imprudent thing to do, but it would lessen the risk of leaving what remains of the city's credit to the hazards of the existing city government.

It is as true now as ever that when the Sierras are drawn upon for a water supply that supply should be available for all the bay cities and all the bay cities should be united in a metropolitan water district for the purposes of that enterprise. Meantime, San Francisco should go ahead and, if it can, perfect its title to a Sierra source abundant for all the cities around the bay.

Meantime, a source of power supply should be held only second in importance to a source of supply of water. If the signs of the times are to be depended on the city of the future will furnish its own lights and operate its own traction system. This will require power and the cities about the bay may as well own their sources of power as their sources of water. The fact that the San Joaquin power company is invading the oil districts of Kern with hydro-electric energy, in competition with oil that virtually costs nothing, shows what a cheap commodity that energy may become when the cost is reduced to the plant and its maintenance.

That there is an African in the McCarthy woodpile, more huge perhaps than a dozen "Jack" Johnsons, may be suspected, but, in absence of better evidence than suspicion affords, it may be the part of wisdom to forget McCarthy and look at his proposition as imperceptibly as though it blew in from

Pensions In the Civil Service

Next to love of power the greatest incentive to human endeavor is the need for making provision for age. Not all do it. The great majority of all those born into the world enjoy no old age for which provision need be made. Their six feet of earth sufficeth them. Perhaps the best provision that a man and a woman can make for life's evening is the rearing of a family of good citizens. It seldom proves inadequate.

But pauperism of the aged is nevertheless a burden upon society. The number of those who fail to provide for themselves is so great as to constitute a social menace. In the case of the civil service it is especially burdensome in that it chokes the service with dead timber. The problem is not an easy one and nowhere has it been solved with satisfaction.

England has struggled with the problem for nearly a hundred years and has not solved it. It began by deducting from all salaries paid to civil service servants $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 5 per cent for the creation of a pension fund, but the salaries were held to be too small to stand the drain and those who died or retired before reaching sixty-five gained nothing. Hence the contributory factor was eliminated and a direct pension substituted, but that was found to tend toward lower salaries than were paid by private enterprises so that the servants of the public paid their own pensions in one way if not in another. And so it will always be. The guaranteed snug corner and free table in age will somehow be paid for during life, as they ought to be. The natural adjustments of salaries and wages in commerce and industry will determine that beyond the power of governments to ordain otherwise, and it is well that it is so. Public servants, as well as others, should pull their own weight to the end.

Therefore, it is in vain that employees of the national government assemble in mass meetings to resolve against the contributory plan. Whatever system is adopted, the Gillett or the Goulden, will be all the same to them in the long run. They will pay their own pensions, and they ought to. The important point is that there be a pension system of some kind, with compulsory retirement, that will enable the government to rid its service of dead wood. The welfare of the nation requires that. This is the more imperative because the civil service attracts mainly those who are minus quantities. If they had the plus condition of mind and body they would be forging ahead in the world of individual endeavor. A salary, a stool and a pension at the end would have no attractions for them. What the government does in the matter of pensions for civil servants it must do in self defense and for the good of the service.

It is in vain to urge that those in the service might provide their own insurance cheaper. They won't do it, and government cannot discharge into pauperism those who have served it long, no matter if it be their own fault that provision has not been made for age. In their cases government must be paternal whether it would or no. The issue between the Gillett and Goulden pension proposals is one of salary, not of pensions. In the long run all pensions are paid by the pensioners and not otherwise. And so it should be.

The Head of the Party

The president of the Republic is the putative head of the party in power in the nation, as the governor of a state is the putative head of the party in power in the state; but it frequently happens that the fact does not square with the putation.

When William Howard Taft succeeded to the presidential chair Nelson A. Aldrich succeeded to the leadership of the Republican party in this country. If there was anyone back of Aldrich manipulating him, as he manipulates others, that one was J. Pierpont Morgan representing the allied Morgan and Rockefeller interests. All signs point to the essential truth of this statement. Its import may be the easier comprehended if we reflect that while James N. Gillett has been the putative head of the Republican party in California, William F. Herrin has been the actual head. It has fared badly with these heads of the party in nation and state this year of our Lord. Amen!

But the Republican party in this nation is about to change heads. It is about to knock off the new and put on the old. Theodore Roosevelt was head of the party while he was president, and when he laid aside that headship of his clan to go on a hunting expedition to Africa, he laid aside a greater power than that of being president. This is what his swinging around the circle means. This is what "My Progressive Policies" require for their fulfillment. He is getting the ear of the people and the response is instant and insistent.

Theodore Roosevelt is a great politician, but his methods are not those of the small politician. The small politician requires a boss and a machine. Theodore Roosevelt will be no boss and he will create no machine. At the psychological moment he will say the thing that is already in the hearts of the American people, though as yet unuttered, and they will get busy on the instant. No machine can stand against them and him.

His first onslaught will be to give "the old guard" in New York, "all the fight they want." Vice-President Sherman has gotten all he wants now. The others will get all they want at Saratoga. He demanded a progressive candidate on a progressive platform. The "old guard" said, "No, we want a reactionary candidate on a reactionary platform." The President, as was characteristic of him, washed his hands of both sides. He is watching the scrimmage with contentment.

"Back from Elba?" Yes, but it is improbable that Theodore Roosevelt has any purpose to resume the presidential chair. It need surprise no one if he were to announce an absolute refusal to become a candidate under any circumstances. This republic is in hard straits if there be only one man in it fit for chief executive, and the anti-third term tradition is not unwholesome.

But leadership is different. There is no position greater or more responsible than that of leadership of the dominant political party in a nation of ninety millions of people. That is the position to which Theodore Roosevelt aspires. Himself a man in whom moral purpose is a passion, he is able to make appeal to the elemental enthusiasms of the race. That is the secret of his power, the spirit of his purpose. If heaven shall spare his life we shall witness such a reaction from reaction as will set the nation to throbbing with high resolves. We have had a year-and-a-half of, what shall we call it? not marking-time for we have gone forward, not inaction in legislation for there has been much good legislation. Shall we call it a waiting for a voice of leadership in tune with the ear of the nation? The smile of the President is infectious, but the voice of him, well, few had ears to hear any message he has had to deliver.

We are on the eve of great events. We have rested. The cohorts of progress are ready to swing into line and go forward at the call of leadership. That leadership is "Back from Elba."

What is the goal? A more equitable distribution of the five or six billions a year of wealth that the commerce and industry of this country together creates; the holding of the common inheritance for the common use, yielding only to those who, in development, render service to the public in a return commensurate with the service rendered. What more?

It is your fight, reader of The California Weekly. Get into it.

Carey's Farm City

It is a pleasant dream in which Mr. Elmer Ellsworth Carey indulged himself when he penned his "Farm City" idea, but it is of the stuff that dreams are made of. It is impossible that the bulk of humanity shall be agricultural. The inventor of farm implements has taken care of that. When five men can feed more people than fifty could fifty years ago forty-five of them have got to hunt jobs elsewhere than in agriculture.

It is easy, too, to overdo the small farm idea. Some of the most lamentable degradations the world knows have come from subdividing "widow's thirds" into sixths, twelfths, twenty-fourths, and so on, to infinitesimal patches here and there. The cost of superintendence, the restrictions as to commodities, renders competition with real farms, except in truck gardening, out of the question and the truck market is easily over supplied.

There is a way, however, in which a scheme something like that which Mr. Carey has elaborated might be worked out in limited measure. There are districts in France where it has been done. In such instances each farm is a factory as well as a farm. During the growing season the farm commands the attention, but all the rest of the year, and on rainy days, by touching a button a loom is started or a lathe or some sort of machinery for manufacture. This form of manufacture, like market gardening, may easily be overdone. The great factory with its division and subdivision of labor, its massing of forces where materials and product may be handled with least of waste of time and effort, ordinarily will put the home factory out of commission. It is true that in Japan hand looms still compete with power in weaving cottons, but the weavers are ever on or below, never above the poverty line, and Mr. Carey's benevolent lucubrations contemplate affluence and not poverty.

While the problem of sustenance is important, and to become increasingly so as population presses upon subsistence, it is mainly a problem of distribution and avoidance of waste, not of production. The world is hungry for things, not foods. It wants automobiles, pianos, picture hats, travel, theatres, soft clothes, social functions, fine houses. These needs will absorb the activities of the work-day world in larger measure than agriculture ever will.

The farms have been the breeding places and the cities the shambles of civilization. "Back to the land" is good—for the rejuvenation of the worn-out, but the greatest danger threatening agriculture is that farming will be transformed into a manufacturing of agricultural commodities by captains of industry, employing wage earners as factories do. This will take "back to the farm" all the frivolities and artificialities of city life together with the slums and so destroy the breeding places of the nations.

In frankness, we find place for Mr. Carey's imaginative "Farm City," not because we find in it much of practical value, but because it may set in motion trains of thought, or even of speculation, that may prove important. For, of all problems that beset us, there is not one that outranks that of agricultural America. Both the trend and the pressure of our age is toward the annihilation of that farm life which, with all its isolation and unattractiveness, has proven the backbone, the soul, the conscience of our American civilization. It were better to keep it as it is, if by any means anything can be kept as it is, which it cannot, than to make it so ape the city as to copy its vanities and lose its own virtues.

Panama

The consensus of opinion, national and world wide, is that Uncle Sam did, in relation to the Philippines and Porto Rico, what he was in honor bound to do, no more and no less. Why not do the same with Panama? The government of that country is harassing the canal zone and creating embarrassments for our government. Why permit the game of "pussy wants an office" to be played at our expense and with no profit to the Panamans? It were better to treat that incipient republic as Porto Rico is being treated, better for the Panamans, better for the Americans, better for the world that will use the canal, better for everybody. Let's do it.

Why Not All Be Happy?

Prohibitionists point with pride to statistics which seem to show that, whereas, ten years ago, there were only 2,500,000 Americans living under prohibitory laws now there are 41,000,000. Why should they not be happy? The association of brewers of the United States claim that the consumption of beer has, during the first decade of the new century, increased 51 per cent. What cause for complaint have they? The distillers point with pride to trade statistics which show that the consumption of spirits has, in the last ten years, increased 45 per cent in this country and business continues good. Why should they grumble? And if the prohibitionists, the brewers and the distillers are all satisfied with past, present and future, why should the rest of us become exercised? Why shouldn't we all be happy?

No Occasion For Surprise

Reports from the southern portion of the state indicate a favorable disposition toward the voting of $5,000,000 in state taxes for the Panama-Pacific exposition. San Francisco may well think twice before entering upon such an enterprise, but not the state so far as its share is concerned, provided, that the exposition held in San Francisco be the only one held in the United States with governmental recognition and, provided further, that the expenditure be contingent upon San Francisco's raising its proposed subscription in hard cash and voting its credit likewise. One fair or none, all contribute together or none at all! Faith must be so good as to leave no room for bad.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Few of us, if we wished to develop a fine rose, would stick a cutting in the ground and go off and leave it to shift for itself, beset with weeds, deprived of moisture, in an impoverished soil; and yet there are times when it would seem as though the Almighty had pursued much such a course with men. We find ourselves beset by the temptation to overreach or to underpay, to struggle for all the traffic will bear instead of being content with a reasonable return on a reasonable investment; friction, blind prejudice and unreasoning partisanship confront us at every turn to lead us astray, and we feel that if only we might withdraw from the world and live in seclusion, as did the holy men of old, then, indeed, might we develop symmetrically.

We couldn't. Those holy men of old generally did not. In their withdrawal from their fellows they became morbid and unhealthful of mind, half insane and, if they conceived and taught a few great truths, they also conceived and taught a thousand distressing errors. The Almighty knew what he was doing when he placed men upon this earth. What is food and drink for the rose would mean poison and death to the child.

This has been demonstrated in a most practical way by "Daddy" George, the founder and good angel of the George Junior Republic, of Freeville, New York, founded for the purpose of giving bad boys and girls a chance to grow into good men and good women. Instead of taking them out of the world as we find it, and as most reformatories do, Mr. George undertook to surround their new world with as many elements of the old as possible, for the reason that those institutions and customs that go to make up society are the very best yet devised for the development of manly and womanly character.

Property is made the foundation of the social order in this little republic as it is in the greater. No one has anything that he does not earn or steal, borrow or buy. The newcomer is given a job at whatever he may be able to turn his hand to, but he does not have to take it if he does not want to. His room costs him so much and his meals cost so much. The republic will not trust him for more than a day's lodging and victuals. If he would rather sell his shirt than work he can do that and, if he has nothing to sell and would rather go to jail to live on bread and water than take a job, he can do that, too. The only limitation upon his liberty is that he cannot go away from Freeville.

Sometimes newcomers live in jail, and by begging or by borrowing, several weeks before they go to work. The saloon and the brothel are kept away, but everything else is as much as possible as it is outside, and because that is the best possible condition for the development of character. Remembering that only those who are looked upon as incorrigible are sent there at all the results achieved are remarkable. Not all are redeemed to good citizenship, but most of them are, and not a few splendid, scholarly men and women have been developed at Freeville out of material that promised no good thing.

The special lesson to be learned from all this is that it is citizenship that does it. The colony is self governing and suffrage is equal. Every citizen twelve years old and upward has a vote, all officers are elected, they make their own laws and mete out justice with their own judges and juries, and justice is established in Freeville. The quality of justice is just rather than merciful. Sometimes the management has to appeal the case to a higher court to prevent criminals inflicting upon criminals penalties unnecessarily severe. Whoever avoids or neglects the obligations of citizenship deprives himself of those very experiences that are most necessary to his intellectual and moral development. Good thing to remember when one feels out of patience with the world.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Figures That Indicate No Drouth

No inconsiderable number of the American commonwealths have enacted prohibition laws within the last ten years, and yet—and here is the striking feature of the situation—the increase in the consumption of alcoholic liquors has gone merrily, not to say hilariously, on. Witness the figures: Commence with the beer sales, which amounted to 39,330,848 barrels in 1900. In 1910, notwithstanding the spread of prohibition, 59,485,117 barrels were sold, an increase of 51.2 per cent. To be sure, the population of the nation has increased fully 20 per cent in the same time, but this leaves a 25 per cent increase in beer consumption to be accounted for. A similar condition in reference to distilled spirits prevails. In 1900 93,391,827 gallons of such liquors were drank, and in 1910 this total had increased to 134,572,010 gallons, an increase of 44.9 per cent, or fully 20 per cent over that of population. It is when we pause to consider averages that the heart grows weary in the breast. To illustrate the idea, the average man, woman and child of us all must, in order to do his share in the beery flow, drink about 20 gallons, or, say, 320 glasses annually. This would not seem so bad if the rest of us were not compelled to hold up the end of the babes and older infants who cannot drink, the women who do not drink and the men who will not drink, but, considering these, the burden appears heavy. Then, in addition to the beer, we must drink a gallon and a half apiece of whisky or other distilled spirits—infants, most women and some men still barred. Considering the states that have "gone dry," our burden seems unduly heavy.

Uncle Sam's Navy in Peace and War

From 1861 to 1865 inclusive our days were red with the fires of war. Those were the years when great navies as well as great armies were direly and regrettably needed, and it is not strange that vast sums were invested in the construction, equipment and maintenance of battleships. So we are not surprised when we read that the sum expended on Uncle Sam's navy during that five years was $326,650,069. The tremendous need of the time justified the tremendous expenditure. But the five years just past were years of profound peace. There has been neither war nor rumor of war, and the utmost use of a navy has been found in taking a show trip around the world. Yet in these five tranquil years we have expended $573,022,101 on our navy, and this is an increase of more than 75 per cent over those five years which knew the agony of civil war. It is a fine situation for the owners of steel mills, but is it as fine for the people who have paid much more than a half billion dollars for navy equipment in a time of peace? There are those who hold that less expenditure for building navies, and more for building men, would be preferable. If the world would consent to it great would be the gain.

The Very Latest in Postal Cards

Have you received, and added to the collection in your album, an "aerial postcard?" If not, nothing could be clearer than that you are not entirely up with the times. This postal card is of French inception, as the name printed on it, "carte aerienne," would indicate. The aviator who desires to keep in the postal swim has them printed with pictures of his own aeroplane, and they also bear a printed request that any person who finds one of them will deliver it at a postoffice for forwarding. With a bunch of the "aerial postcards" ready addressed, the aviator writes in a space left for that purpose the height to which he has ascended at the time of writing, drops the card, and whoever finds it is supposed to do the rest. The time may come when such postal cards will be a drug on the market, but, with aviators still decidedly limited in number, the person who now receives such a card may consider himself fortunate, if he cares for that sort of thing.

Light For the Belated Joyous

Jocketa, a village of Saxony, recently installed electric light for its streets. Now it chances that the people of Jocketa are a very simple-minded and old-fashioned folk, so old-fashioned and simple-minded that it never once occurred to them that it would be of any earthly use to have streets lighted after 11 p. m. Accordingly an ordinance providing for shutting off the light at that time was adopted, and at that point the trouble began. It transpired that a number of Jocketa's leading citizens were not so old-fashioned but that they had a club, and it further transpired that the club sometimes detained its members till after 11 p. m. and dismissed them in such condition that they needed all the light obtainable in order not to walk on both sides of the streets at once. Let it be recorded that the "city fathers" rose to the emergency. They had a penny-in-the-slot device attached to the electric light poles, and after that all that the clubman had to do was to drop a penny in the slot, if he could find it, and light shone upon his path. Sometimes, to be sure, a man might find it difficult to walk forward faster than he walked backward, but in that event he could keep on depositing pennies until his forward tendency had overcome his backward tendency and the expense would not be heavy. The idea is ingenious, but it probably would be more practical if a greater proportion of the men who go home after 11 p. m. had a penny left which they might invest in light.

Prehistoric Man and the Ape

That long, long ago man who dwelt in caves and fought with the beasts of the fields for the raw food he ate was very little ahead of the ape in intelligent development. At least, this is the view entertained by Boule and Anthony, French physiologists who recently have written a treatise on the brain power of prehistoric man. Their theory of his brain power is based upon the convolutions of his brain, as indicated by such skulls of antediluvian men as have been found. These skulls show much development of that portion of the brain devoted to the animal instincts, while that part devoted to the faculty known as association of ideas is developed in very slight degree. In fact, the brain of the ape shows about as much development in this higher respect as does that of the prehistoric man. Again, the development of the brain nerve supposed to control articulate speech is so slight that the language the cave men talked must have been extremely rudimentary. The most notable difference between the ape and our remote ancestor consisted in the fact that the latter used his hands almost exclusively in grasping objects, while the ape uses both hands and feet. On the whole, according to these Frenchmen, the main difference between man and the ape consists in the long forward journey man has taken since the two started out not so far from side by side.

Newfoundland To Be Explored

Centuries before Christopher Columbus made that celebrated voyage which resulted in giving America to the world Norsemen had crossed the stormy waters of the north Atlantic, and Newfoundland was nearly, if not quite, the first of American lands to be looked upon by European eyes. That was a long time ago, and during most of the centuries since then the name and outlines of Newfoundland have been known throughout the world, so it is likely to strike the reader as somewhat odd that now, for the first time in all these centuries, this well known unknown land is to be explored and mapped. It is true; long as Newfoundland has been known, it yet is largely an unknown wilderness. Much of it never has been penetrated except by Indians and, in a desultory way, by an occasional hunter. Two Englishmen now have undertaken to explore and map it, and they expect to devote all of two years except the winters to the work. The enterprise has been undertaken under the auspices of the royal geographical society of England.

The Growth of Germany

In 1870 Germany and France were just about even in population. Forty years have passed since then, and now Germany has a population of about 65,000,000, while that of France is but 39,000,000. A remarkable difference, this, in so brief a time. Nor can it be accounted for exclusively on the ground of that "race suicide" with which France has been charged, for, although France be thus guilty, the birth rate has decreased in Germany also, only, the death rate has decreased still more rapidly. Withal, the emigration rate has been reduced mightily in Germany. Thirty years ago 200,000 people left that country annually; now the emigration has been reduced by ninety per cent, or to 20,000 annually. On the whole, perhaps somebody was right when he wrote: "Germany seems prosperous enough to make it of advantage for Germans to remain at home."

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

HAWTHORNE ON WOMEN WRITERS

Hawthorne's letters, written to his publisher, from Liverpool during his consulship there, contain opinions of much interest. In one he wrote: "In my last I recollect I bestowed some vituperation on female authors. I have since been reading 'Ruth Hall,' and I must say I enjoyed it a good deal. The woman writes as if the devil was in her, and that is the only condition under which a woman ever writes anything worth reading. Generally women write like emasculated men and are only to be distinguished from male authors by greater feebleness and folly; but when they throw off the restraints of decency and come before the public stark naked, as it were—then their books are sure to possess character and value."

PUNCH'S NEW CHIEF CARTOONIST

The successor of the late Linley Sambourne as chief cartoonist of Punch is Bernard Partridge, whose delicate line work, able drawing, and clever ideas are known to everybody familiar with the famous weekly, says a London dispatch in the New York Times.

Mr. Partridge is a comparatively young man, being 48 years old and for twenty of those years he has been drawing for Punch. His father was a celebrated surgeon, and before Bernard Partridge devoted all his time to the art in which he has succeeded so well he was also an actor.

As in the case of Sambourne, his first work for Punch was done by request. It was a drawing of a Bishop and a shoeblick. He had been illustrating about that time the sketches which F. Anstey Guthrie (F. Anstey) had collected from Punch for publication in a book, and Sir Francis Burnand asked him for an illustration for another little sketch by the same author.

Soon after becoming a contributor "B. P." joined the staff permanently. It was he and Lindley Sambourne who were mainly responsible for the introduction of process work in place of wood engraving. This was during the time that Sir John Tenniel was chief cartoonist, but Sir John himself, though he was much interested in the change, and Mr. Partridge showed him a number of good results, never worked by process. His cartoons, always in pencil, were invariably reproduced by wood engraving.

"Process is more accurate," said Mr. Partridge in an interview this week in The Pall Mall Gazette. "You may draw a good portrait, and yet, in a wood engraving, lose something of the likeness. Process is surer and more reliable; but, on the other hand, you lose a great deal of the richness of the effect."

Mr. Partridge began to draw political cartoons on the retirement of Sir John Tenniel in 1901. His first subject was the codfisheries dispute between England and France, in which the fish were represented by a couple of fisher girls, respectively English and French. For the last three months, throughout Mr. Sambourne's illness, he has been acting as chief cartoonist, one of his most successful and striking works being "Et tu, Brute!" in which John Bull is holding up the umbrella of free trade against the Japanese onslaught with the short sword of increased tariffs.

Mr. Partridge's preference in his work is for subjects that give scope for the imagination. The political cartoon that simply contains portraits of statesmen in frockcoats he considers rather dull. If he were to criticise it would probably be that the tendency of modern times in regard to cartoons is, in his opinion, to be rather too precise.

Twenty years ago if a subject were suggested that immediately struck one as good, it was accepted, but nowadays the tendency is to criticise it too closely. Tenniel's most famous cartoon, "Dropping the Pilot," would, he thinks, scarcely be possible at the present day on account of the criticism to which it would be subjected, that the symbol is incomplete, the dropping of a pilot being merely the ordinary routine of a voyage, implying no slur on the pilot.

OF ART IN WRITING

Robert Louis Stevenson so greatly loved the craftsmanship of his profession that he often came near to spoiling the effect of what he had to say by using such extreme care and dexterity in saying it that the reader is more taken with the manner than the substance. Stevenson once described a good writer as one who handles words as a skilled juggler handles the vari-colored balls that he tosses and catches, tossing words so that they maintain a rhythmic motion and throw off flashes of color and rearrange constantly into new and charming shapes.

We note Stevenson because he represents conscious artfulness in writing in at once its most dexterous and its most winning embodiment. He was the delicately organized, sensitive, sophisticated modern, fully conscious of his purpose in writing and conscious of the means he could command to produce his effects. He is interesting to the student of the history of literature because he is a type of the inevitable literary product of these sophisticated times.

But he is especially interesting when thrown into contrast with a truly artless writer, Shakespeare. Not that Shakespeare did not realize that there is an art of writing, but that the art was so natural to him that he gave little thought to it—one would say none, except for his sonnets—and he could hurtle onward through masterpiece after masterpiece, careless of form, indifferent to breaches of canonical style, carried resistlessly by the tremendous momentum of his passions, the superb self-confidence of his intellect, and the unequalled native gift of song.

But it must be noted that he really was artless at heart. Great as his intellect was and piercing his intuitions, his heart was his overmastering motive. Not since the dawn of time was there ever a spirit so responsive to emotion as this volcano of passions, tuned to melody. He was too deeply touched by emotions to describe them artfully.

Space forbids an elaboration of these suggestions, but the foregoing may point to the reader a path for interesting speculation upon the effect of art upon writing. The artless, the writer believes, will always be the transcendently great style of writers. Human society and individual destiny will always be shaped by emotion primarily.

IN SHASTA

By Charles H. Shinn

Where the torrent winks in spray
Past its pebbles worn and gray—
Where the mountain slopes to meet
Waves that fret about its feet—
Where the glance can sweep across
Rifted rocks and fading moss,
Groups of clinging chaparral,
Manzanita rooted wall,
Edges of deserted mines,
Set around with blasted pines—
Where the autumn sun is clear
On the sleepy village near,
On the long black bridge below,
On the orchard's leafless row,
And, across the narrow trail,
Slowly pass the fearless quail—
There's an alcove. Overhead
Droop the dogwood clusters red,
And I find a snow-white stone,
Set in fern, as royal throne,
Thence to look on height and stream,
Sunlit woods, and autumn's gleam.
So, to this long-waiting nook
I have brought a well-worn book,
Full of autumn's windy gold,
Full of music long untold,
That I may, in this fair place,
Meet the poet face to face,
And, while low the river beats,
Read the mellow verse of Keats.

ROSEBERRY ON WEALTH AND GENIUS

Lord Rosebery reopened the Auld Brig of Ayr on the 29th of July. Burns clubs all over the world helped collect the $50,000 to restore it. In his address, Lord Rosebery rejoiced that Burns had been persuaded not to accept the situation in Jamaica once offered him.

"Amid the tropical luxuriance of that island," he said, "and the degrading conditions of slavery, together with all the convivial associations of the island at that time, I do not believe that we would have heard much more of Burns. Some of his genius would have evaporated. He might have come back wealthy and strutted about as a rum lord, or sugar lord, or tobacco lord, but he would have been a totally different Burns. His genius could hardly have survived the luxury of wealth."

"Poverty produces masterpieces, but wealth smothered them. You would be able to count on your fingers all the masterpieces produced by rich people. You would find that almost all have been written under the pressure of poverty, though I believe Shakespeare became the owner of some urban property in his after years. But take one instance: Would Wordsworth have written any better than Rogers had Wordsworth been as rich as Rogers?"

"And my clear conclusion from a very general survey of all great masterpieces of literature is that a genius should not be wealthy, or he is very likely to see his genius stifled by that fact."

BELASCO ON PLAY-WRITING

David Belasco in an article in the Associated Sunday Magazines says that most of the work of novice playwrights shows lack of concentration on their theme and lack of adequate study of literature and life. He recommends focusing the interest of the action on the affairs of two central characters and forcing all other interests into the background.

Mr. Belasco emphasizes the fact that dialogue in plays is intended to address the intelligence through the ear, and so must be composed under different conditions than those regulating composition of words for the eye, as in story writing. He says that the attention of the audience must not be distracted by stage tricks introduced for their own ingenious sake. He advises study of methods of gaining the audience's sympathy for the central character, and of gaining suspense by withholding as much of the explanation of the plot as possible until a time when it will be effective both as a surprise and as an explanation.

Mr. Belasco concludes by saying that plays are built, not written; that they may be greatly changed in rehearsal from their form as they leave the author's pen; that the more work that is done by the author the better will be his play and less work will have to be done by the stage director when the play is produced.

In this connection it is interesting to note that Bronson Howard, Clyde Fitch and William Gillette have seen certain of their plays produced as they left their pens, with scarcely the alteration of a comma, so expertly did their authors develop their ideas according to stage conditions.

PERSONALIA

The family name of Ethel Barrymore and John Barrymore is Blythe. The Barrymore name is for stage use only.

Mrs. M. E. Pengelly, aged 84, worked all day at the polls for the election of Mrs. Florence G. Mills as a member of the school board of Kalamazoo, Mich.

Edmond Rostand, author of "Chantecler," recently won the grand prize offered by the French Society for the Protection of Animals. The award was really made not because of any active friendship shown by the poet for dumb creatures but because of the genuine sympathy and tenderness for them which is supposed to have animated to a very great degree his composition of "Chantecler."

ABOARD A CRUISER AT MARE ISLAND

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

The scene from the Vallejo side looking across the narrow strait to Mare Island, is full of action. A half dozen impudent little launches puff and cough and turn sharply in to the landing, leaving a sweeping half-circle of foaming wake, or shrill their little sirens in barking warning to one another to keep out of the way. On the other side of the water rises a confused mass of smokestacks, brick buildings, cranes and masts. Men, little as insects in the distance, run about decks or crawl along wharves. A haze of blue smoke veils the whole scene. The sharp clangor of five bells—one-two, one-two, one—rings out, and ends abruptly. A bugle blows.

We sit on the deck of the ferryboat, lazily waiting to start. The journey will take four minutes; we must wait three-quarters of an hour to begin it. We have just walked down the main street of Vallejo from end to end, and now we look back and wonder how so small a town supports so many stores. Then we recall the crowd of hundreds of sailors who passed us as we came, and remember that Jack ashore loves gewgaws, and that most of the stores display them. A glance discloses also that the largest building in town is the Naval Y. M. C. A. for Enlisted Men, an antidote for the plentiful saloons that pitfall the course from the wharf to its haven.

The captain of the ferryboat rouses us from reverie. He asks for our fare. There are only we three going toward Mare Island, which hundreds have just left. We pay, and discover that the captain is still more versatile. He enters the pilot house, pulls the whistle cord and heads the boat against the tide. Almost before we have time to wonder idly if he stokes the furnace too, we drift gently into the slip on the Mare Island side.

Here we confront the majesty of the National Government in one of its most austere manifestations. A sign warns us that smoking on the island is prohibited, and that all visitors must show passes. Before we can wonder where passes may be obtained, a sentry confronts us, beckons with crooked forefinger, and without words, leads us into an office where rifles are stacked in their racks and an orderly snores softly from a cot. An officer rises, also without words, and enters a second room, behind the first. We follow. He seats himself at a desk, draws a yellow slip of paper before him, takes up a pen, writes "Mr.," and lifts his eyes and at last his voice in one word—"Name?" We spell it out and he hands us the paper, neatly, blotted, disentangles his legs from his sword, and rises to watch us walk out.

We leave the ferryhouse—but a word before we leave. The ferryhouse on the Vallejo side is private property. It is a dingy, time-stained, one-story affair, without a trace of architectural design. The ferryhouse on the Mare Island side is government property. It is a frame building, but built upon lines that suggest massive strength, designed with the intention, at least, of following a consistent architectural style and with an eye to beauty as well as utility.

We follow the wharf northward to see the cruisers. Two of the three that lie anchored here for repairs are in our course. Huge as they are, they are yet trimly beautiful. They have much the grace of a tall, clean-limbed athlete, stripped for a race. There is strength, but there is also the beauty of fitly rounded curves. The smokestacks tower upwards with a suggestion of the pride of self-possession of a boldly erect man.

A gangplank leads from the wharf to the high crest of the towering side of the first cruiser. A sentry paces nervously up and down before it on the concrete wharf. As we approach he stops, presents arms, directs us to ask the officer on deck for permission to view the ship, and resumes his restless beat.

The officer on deck is pursuing the same restless track as the sentry below. He marches sharply across the narrow deck, turns abruptly and marches back. He carries a useless telescope in his hand, which we mistake at first for the ancient baton of authority. His gait and the expression on his face suggest an unappeasable irritation. We have seen this rigmarole of official squirrel-wheel evolutions before, however, and realize that he is only following one of those hoary traditions of discipline that carry their intention of inspiring awe to even tolerably sophisticated people.

We ask permission to view the ship, and he views us smilelessly for an appreciable interval before granting it. This is more of the same rigmarole, and we endure it patiently, waiting for the processes of naval show to work out their accustomed ends. He has no idea of refusing the request. At last he turns and beckons to a sailor grinning down over the railing of the deck above.

"Show the people the ship—please," he says, and turns instantly to resume his beat.

The sailor is a good-natured boy, not very grammatical, with the honestest eyes in the world and an innate sense of courtesy, pretty awkward, and not displeased to show us the wonders of the ship. We are told at once that this is the flagship of the fleet, the ship on which the admiral stays and from which he directs all fleet operations. But, he adds at once, the admiral hasn't a word to say about the management of the ship; the captain is supreme here; the admiral only gives out the orders for the movements of the ships as a fleet.

We recall at once having heard somewhere that an admiral at sea is the loneliest mortal in the world. He has his private cabin, where he must remain alone, for the discipline of the navy forbids him to fraternize aboard ship with any inferior officer. When the sailor who is our guide points out that the admiral has even his private kitchen on the ship, the isolation of his job comes home with a deeper thrust. The poor devil cannot even know what the captain has to eat.

But the sorrows of being a boss are forgotten in our interest in the guns. We learn new facts about them. We knew already that the old pictures were out of date that showed the gunner in the attitude of Ajax defying the lightning, holding a lighted torch to a powder hole on the top of the breech. We know that the gunner now stands on a little platform beside the gun—if he stood behind it the recoil would knock him into last week's pi—the platform moving with the recoil so that the shock to the floor will not knock the gunner down. And we knew that the torch and powder hole had given place to a little pistol-like affair, with a trigger to pull that makes an electric connection that makes a spark that ignites the powder.

But we did think that the charge that is put in the breech was made like a rifle cartridge, with the missile and powder all in one shell. Now we learn better. We learn that the missile is the thing that looks like a cartridge, and is put in first—naturally—and that the powder is put in afterwards in bags, several of them, and the breech then closed.

And we learned something about the aiming of the guns. We had supposed, from loose accounts we had read, that one man did all the sighting. Now we know that two are needed: one to keep the gun trained horizontally on the target, and one to keep it trained vertically. And it is so absurdly easy to move these huge heavy guns about. They must be nicely balanced, and the leverages must be tremendous, for two little hand wheels, that a child could turn with the thumb and forefinger, move it swiftly up and down and from side to side.

We pass on to other parts of the ship. Here is the ship's kitchen, or "galley," where twenty ranges stretch out in a row. Here is the ship's bakery, with an electric bread mixer as big as a drygoods box.

"Man got his arm cut off with it the other day," our guide remarks.

"Peace hath her dangers no less than war," we mentally add.

We note that there is little wood anywhere. The floors are bare steel, the walls steel, the beams steel. The only wood we see is the flooring of the upper decks, which are open to the air, and the tables that hang overhead and are swung low, at meal times, by ropes.

Somewhere near amidship a group of fellow-tourists are gathered. We approach and find them standing about a table on which are ribbons and flags, done in embroidery. They are the work of a sailor, who sits by ready to sell his wares. Other sailors sit about, watching to see if he makes a sale, and looking as if they hope he will. Our guide says: "He works at that embroidery all day," and we wonder that our guide does not seem at all disposed to scoff at such a ladylike occupation for a man who is hired by the government to engage in the butchery of war upon a moment's order.

Regaining the upper deck, we look overside and see a group of sailors coaling the admiral's new launch. It has just been delivered from the boat-maker, and steam is being made in her boilers for the first time. No one but the admiral may use her. We note the roomy cabin astern, glassed in, and that the windows are hung with richly embroidered curtains, and that the seats are lavishly upholstered.

We stroll about and look at the men whom the government has hired for "cannon's meat." They are hardly men. Most of them are mere boys, just about the age and appearance of boys who would be lured by our Uncle Sam's brilliantly colored lithographic bill posters describing the charms of travel and education and the chance to save. Most of them are smoking cigarettes and chatting. Some are sitting on their "dinnies-boxes," writing letters. Some are playing backgammon on a board painted on a piece of canvas.

"Do you have much to do?" we ask our guide.

"Not much but loaf most of the time. We holystone the deck once a week, and scrub it every morning. Most of the rest of the time we loaf around."

"Would you rather be ashore or at sea?"

"More fun at sea, only there's no place to spend your money."

"But aren't those men gambling over there?"

"No. Gambling aint allowed. The masters at arms prevent it. They're ship's policemen, carry a club and a gun."

"What about the stories of trouble between the marines and the sailors?"

"Well, the sailors aint got much use for the marines. The marines make us all the trouble they can with the officers, and sometimes we even up ashore. Some sailors make a business of looking for marines on shore leave and licking them. There's talk of doing away with marines altogether, but I ain't anxious for that. They do all the sentry duty, four hour shifts, and if they go we'll have to do it."

We thank our guide and the officer on deck and go down the gang plank. The sentry is still on duty. We pause and remark:

"Great ship you've got here."

"Reckon it looks great when you've never seen one before."

He takes a short turn on his beat and faces us again. In a tone of bitter irony he adds:

"I thought it was a great ship myself once—that's why I'm doing this."

And he about faces and marches away. Poor devil, he bit at the colored posters.

As we walk away to the ferry to go back to Vallejo we sum up the whole experience in one word—childishness. Little men, boys, playing at a silly game, a profitless game. Millions of money and thousands of careers wasted to keep a foolish world's peace and to keep up an ancient court of folly.

At Vallejo we walk up the long wharf to town. A cart rattles by us. An old man in a white cap and blue uniform, with very long white wispy burnisides flying in the breeze, is driving. It is the admiral. His hair proclaims him old, but his face too is childish. The lines that come from the stress of the ordinary vicissitudes of life are not there. His manner is full of childish self-consciousness. He looks as absurd as Baby Tom in a wig and

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

The Mighty Composer Is Love

The wee bird's call to his wee brown mate
 "Sweetheart, sweetheart," is sung,
 For the world is old, and its hour grows late,
 But love is forever young.
 "Sweetheart, sweetheart," he calls and calls;
 "Dear heart," she makes reply.
 Till the night creeps on, and a curtain falls
 Upheld by the stars on high.

The world is asleep, yet the voices blend
 In anthems minute and shrill:
 "Oh, love's the beginning, and love's the end,
 And love is the Father's will."
 And, "Love me, love," sings the tiny throng.
 And "Love" is the sweet reply.
 And all of creation is but a song.
 With "Love" for its chorus high.

We see not the Father, nor know his way
 That leads through the halls of pain,
 But the chorus swells forever and aye,
 And "Love" is its sweet refrain;
 And we need but list to the liner song
 That rings below and above
 To know, though a discord be born of wrong,
 That the mighty Composer is Love

How a Husband May Be Helpful

Many husbands desire to be helpful to their wives, but do not entirely know how. When they have fed the family exchequer, and perhaps have wiped the dishes, they know of nothing further to do, much as they desire it. For the benefit of such I here narrate how Mr. Jotham Meeker helped his wife.

Mrs. Meeker belongs to the Woman's Uplift Club, the members of which, as they admit, are not radical, but are united in firm determination that man's tyranny over the superior sex must cease. She was preparing to attend the club the other evening, when a happy thought occurred to her husband, and he asked her if she would like to have him accompany her. Mrs. Meeker was delighted, and she expressed the opinion that the meeting would do him good. Perhaps it did, but Meeker does not seem to be certain of it.

It chanced that he was the only man at the club that evening, and so the speaker, Miss Rebecca Skatts, did not feel it necessary to modify her remarks in the least.

"The history of the world," she said, "is a record of man's despotism over woman."

"The shame of it!" several women responded, and all looked reproachfully at Meeker.

"We must rise and crush this tyrant," said the speaker.

"We must, indeed!" the women agreed, and one enthusiastic woman absent-mindedly shook her fist at Mr. Meeker.

"As he trampled on us, let us tramp on him," Miss Skatts urged.

"Yes, let's!" a number replied.

And so it continued. Meeker says that never before did he live an hour that was over a month long; says he wouldn't have minded it so much if some of the women had not ceased looking at the speaker so as to glare at him. On the way home Mrs. Meeker thanked him for accompanying her, adding that she often felt the need of his helpful arm to lean upon. But I infer from something I heard Meeker say that she will have to go without leaning hereafter.

Thus is pointed out one way in which men may be helpful to their wives, but I fear that a large number of them will overlook it.

The Doctor's Dire Dilemma

The young physician sat in his lonely office and wept bitterly and while he was weeping a friend came to comfort him.

"Why do you weep?" the friend inquired.

"Alas! I—I—" The young physician broke down utterly but soon assumed a forced composure. "I cannot raise a beard, and what is a young doctor without a—"

Again the young physician broke down, and his friend knew that he was as one who cannot be comforted.

Room For Hope

"He is a Theosophist; says he can remember thirteen lives that he has lived."

"Yes? Well, I feel hope, then."

"Hope of what?"

"Hope that he finally will remember that ten he borrowed from me last winter."

Consid'r'in' This Here Johnson Man

"Consid'r'in' this here Johnson man"—just once he hung his head,
 The grizzled veteran of the "gang" whose Herrin-faith was dead—
 "Consid'r'in' this here Johnson man, an' also namin' Kent
 An' Wallace, Stephens and the rest which gave our game a dent;

Consid'r'in' things
 Which same are facts,
 And also how
 We got the ax,

I wish to state in accents clear a statement which is true:
 I am, and always I have been, a bold Insurgent, too."

"Consid'r'in' this here Johnson man," remarked the beery bum,
 "Consid'r'in' how our game is dead or marked for Kingdom Come;

 Has met the foe and they are his, though damaged as to mind;

Consid'r'in' how

 And we have got
 It in the neck,

I wish to make it mighty clear, so no one need be told,
 That I am now, and always was, in the Insurgent fold."

"Consid'r'in' this here Johnson man"—I'm writing this to say,
 Considering Kent and Stephens, too, and how we ran away
 With almost everything in sight, including some not seen,
 'Tis well that we should now expect the "boys" of the "machine"

To break their necks
 To place secure,
 The while they yell,
 "We're wid ye sure!"

And what I wish to know is this: What are you going to do
 When every rounder shouts, "Make room! for I'm Insurgent, too?"

Thoughtful Man on Some Resolutions

"I notice," said the Thoughtful Man, "that Republican county conventions throughout the state recently have adopted resolutions in the nature of small platforms, and it is observable that there is a similarity in many of them.

"Resolved (they say), That we cordially and heartily indorse the intentions of President Taft and the deeds of Theodore Roosevelt. Naturally, we regret that such gaudy intentions and potent deeds do not get more mixed in the present administration, but, anyway, we patriotically indorse them; and,

"Resolved, That, while we unreservedly admire and esteem our honored President, we unqualifiedly indorse those heroic blows for freedom and right bestowed by La Follette, Bristow and Cummins upon all whom he has chosen as advisers, counselors and friends; and,

"Resolved, That, while we greet our revered President with enthusiasm, we yet hope to catch Aldrich, Cannon and that ilk out when he is not along with them; and,

"Resolved, That we would express our lofty regard for the President's intentions even more emphatically than we here have done were it not that we have been so busy electing or nominating Insurgent congressmen that we really have had no time to spare."

"Will they engross these resolutions and send them to President Taft on a gold platter?" I inquired.

"Not to Taft," the Thoughtful Man responded, "but I don't know how it will be about Roosevelt."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Fine Republican Rallying Ground

It is time for men who believe as Republicans believe and who feel as Republicans feel in relation to government, to get together if they can find common ground upon which to stand. The President, among others, has suggested the Republican national platform of 1908. That was a fine platform. The Watchman has just re-read it. The spirit of it is the spirit of insurgency. In fact, insurgency consisted mainly in striving to incarnate the spirit of that platform into legislation, and standpatism consisted mainly in treating that platform as old lumber, fit only for kindling, having served its purpose when the campaign of 1908 closed. If the standpatters can stand pat on the Republican national platform of 1908 there isn't a doubt that the Lincoln-Roosevelt wing of the Republican party in California can stand on it with both feet right glad to shake hands across the voluble vortex of the last half year's campaigning for Johnson and a free California. But the standpatters must accept that platform in spirit and truth. No mere lip service will suffice. The spirit of it is the spirit of the newer Republicanism. A careful re-reading of that platform will make this clear, and yet we have seen patronage used, pressure employed and threats made to read out of the Republican party Republicans whose only offense was that they accepted that platform in letter and spirit and dared to insist that its pledges be fulfilled.

What It Said Of Roosevelt

In part this platform had this to say of Roosevelt and his policies: "His administration is an epoch in American history. In no other period since national sovereignty was won under Washington, or preserved under Lincoln, has there been such mighty progress in those ideals of government which make for justice, equality and fair dealing among men.

"The highest aspirations of the American people have found a voice. Their most exalted servant represents the best aims and worthiest purposes of all his countrymen. American manhood has been lifted to a nobler sense of duty and obligation. Conscience and courage in public station and higher standards of right and wrong in private life have become cardinal principles of political faith; capital and labor have been brought into closer relations of confidence and interdependence, and the abuse of wealth, the tyranny of power and all the evils of privilege and favoritism have been put to scorn by the simple and manly virtues of justice and fair play.

"We declare our unflinching adherence to the policies he has inaugurated and pledge their continuance under a Republican administration of the government."

Immediately Ballinger was made Secretary of the Interior. On the very night of his inauguration the President refused to ally himself against Cannonism. Pinchot was broken with, Nelson A. Aldrich, the negation of Rooseveltism, was made confidential adviser of the administration, and those who stood for the Roosevelt policies in spirit and truth had their political patronage taken away from them! It is to smile audibly.

Measured By The New Tariff Law

A principal cause of strained relations between standpatism and insurgency in congress was the tariff bill. After declaring for a revision at a special session the Republican platform of 1908 committed itself to a definite standard for revision in these words: "In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad together with a reasonable profit to American industries." In the revision that followed standpatism paid not the smallest attention to this rule for revising a tariff, while insurgency fought at every opportunity to have that rule applied. The President has lost no opportunity to extol the Payne-Aldrich law, but not even he has dared to say that any attempt was made to apply that test in good faith to the making of the schedules. The standpatters in congress not only failed to apply that principle but refused to make any provision for applying it until after the schedules had been enacted into law, the bill had been signed and the party was confronted by a demand for an accounting of its stewardship. Then, at the urgent request of the President, a tariff board was constituted from which it is to be hoped that some good thing may hereafter come. Meantime, the special interests are rejoicing in a special privilege they are like enough to enjoy for years to come. That plank in the platform of 1908 suits the Lincoln-Roosevelt wing of the Republican party to a nicety. Can the "organization" fellows stand on it?

What Should Go Into a 1910 Platform

The Republicans of California may safely accept the National Republican platform of 1908 as a proper rallying ground upon which all Republicans may gather, the administration at Washington is to be endorsed and congress commended, in so far as that platform was carried into effect and no farther. We can afford to waive the issue as to who forced the good things to be done, for, in the final analysis, nothing could have been done without the concurrence of a majority in both houses and the signature of the President, and President and congress did concur in whatever good was accomplished.

But there are other issues. Pressing problems are nearer home. There is much to be done. Not all of the things needing to be done for California can be outlined in a party platform. Bridges can only be crossed when they have been reached, but there are some such bridges in sight. We must cross them as soon as we get to them and we must get to them as soon as possible.

There must be an uncompromising plank in favor of a free party and the exclusion from government of public service corporations and other special interests as such. Government must be of the people and for the people. How far it shall be by the people, directly instead of representatively, is for the people themselves to say. The initiative, the referendum and the recall should be made available for use whenever The People wish to use them, only being careful to provide that the light and frothy element in our political life, ever in evidence, shall not abuse elemental powers by precipitating needless conflicts over frivolous issues. The platform should say as much by way of restriction upon direct methods.

Some Things Must Wait

There are a great many reforms in the state government that a progressive Republicanism should grapple with, but they have not been sufficiently discussed to warrant their finding a place in a party platform. Between the election and the assembling of the legislature they should be discussed with all the care possible and volunteers should busy themselves with drafting bills embodying such ideas, but the likelihood is that a good share of such reform measures will have to go over until another campaign for the proper education of the public in regard to them. Reference is here made to making the machinery of the state government more responsible and more efficient and, therefore, more honest and economical.

But there are other issues upon which unequivocal declarations may now be made, such as favoring a remodeling of the direct primary law in the interests of simplicity and economy, the non-partisan election of the judiciary, a direct and state-wide advisory vote for United States senator, the reformation of our criminal procedure, the reformation and unification of our prisons and reformatories and the creation of a state reformatory for adult delinquents. Finally, the pledging of the party and its candidates against all measures having for their purpose the "cinching" or penalizing of corporate enterprises however great, and in favor of equal laws and equal opportunities as well as equal justice for all. While the Watchman regards the platforms upon which candidates made their campaigns for nomination as paramount the importance of having a state platform that rings, and rings true, is not to be overlooked.

Some Questions Of Conscience

What is the Republican State Convention to do where nominations have been made at the direct primary that were not fit to be made? Shall all the candidates be pledged to support all the ticket? That the will of the majority is the law of the land is a cardinal principle of our government. Government cannot exist, except by force, as in Russia, unless the minority abide the will of the majority. Under the primary law a plurality has all the moral sanction of a majority. These considerations bid us, in the absence of fraud which vitiates all obligations, "take our medicine," even though it be a bitter dose.

But it can be of little advantage to resolve to do what everybody knows nobody will pay any attention to when he comes to vote, while the harm of being put in a false position may be great. Therefore it will be well for the convention to exact no pledges that will not be as binding upon delegates and upon voters as upon candidates. That convention cannot bind candidates for the candidates have all been nominated. The convention can bind its own delegates and the state committee it will create, but no one else.

And no resolution adopted by any convention can so bind a voter to his party as to nullify that voter's obligation to vote as he would pray, in honesty of purpose and with purity of motive. Commend the ticket to the thorough scrutiny and favorable consideration of voters and stop right there. Let the candidates stand or fall as they deserve.

A Question Of Hard Cash

No doubt Mr. Herrin is chuckling in his innermost soul. He is biding his time. He will narrowly watch the reorganization of the Republican party in this state, the selection of its chairman and secretary, its campaign committee and especially the finance committee thereof. Just there Mr. Herrin expects to laugh last and best. "Where," amid his "te-hes" and "ha-has" that gentleman will demand to know, "are you fellows going to get your money for making the campaign?"

The question is pertinent. So far as simplicity and directness are concerned the method of the "organization" had everything to commend it. The Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company paid the bills. If that bureau will withhold its largess from Republicans and Democrats alike both parties will get along right enough. Not much of a campaign will be needed. It has already been made. But if that company espouses the cause of Bell, against whom hate may have grown cold, then the question of hard cash will be a hard question for the Republicans to handle.

But they will handle it. They have got to. Decent politics under the old system is impossible. Whoever puts up the money for a campaign will demand, and receive, the advantages of having made the campaign. If the people want the advantages they must pay the price and, until such time as legitimate campaign expenses are defrayed out of the common treasury, the only way to get the needed money is to pass around the hat. The people, yes, the common people, must be educated to give to their party if they would receive in good government.

Our Candid Friend Is Much In Error

Our Candid Friend of the Call, in trying to account for the increase in the assessment of the railroads in recent years, has given the chief credit to Alexander Brown of the State Board of Equalization, aided by the consent of Mr. W. F. Herrin. There is only just a little of truth in that version. It was Mr. Harriman and not Mr. Herrin who gave his consent and it was given to Governor Pardee and not to Alexander Brown. State Controller A. B. Nye was Governor Pardee's private secretary and he interested the governor in a new plan of taxation whereby the state's revenues would be separated from the revenues needed for the subdivisions of the state, and Governor Pardee went at the subject with customary vigor. The State Taxation Commission followed and "amendment number one" was the outcome. Governor Pardee had pushed the issue of railroad taxation upon the attention of the Board of Equalization and much progress was made during Pardee's administration. Inasmuch as Mr. Harriman had consented to the 4 per cent gross income tax it naturally suggested itself to more minds than one that the State Board of Equalization apply that rule in fixing the railroad valuation and see what it would result in. It was done with results at once startling to all and satisfactory, at least, to the public. Why Mr. Harriman consented to this arrangement can only be surmised, he being incommunicado, but there are two, possibly three, reasons why: One is that it is the general tendency all over the country and uniformity among all the states in taxing railroads is desirable to large enterprises. Another is that taxes are advancing the world over and, if a stable method of taxing railroads can be devised, difficult to be increased, even though on a parity with other forms of taxation at the moment of going into effect, it will, by remaining stationary, soon fall behind the general advance that is world wide. Shall The Watchman venture one more reason why, preposterous as it may seem? Mr. Harriman may have become converted to the "square deal" so far as taxation is concerned. The fact that the railroads of California had, between 1884 and 1904, shirked $14,000,000 in taxation may have sufficed him. Anyhow, Our Candid Friend is in the wrong.

The President and Tariff Commission A number of Republican platforms adopted throughout the state have declared in favor of the tariff commission idea "as favored by President Taft." Now as a matter of cold fact the President is not in favor of a tariff commission. He has denounced it with particularity. The commission idea implies that the schedules are to be fixed by an expert, non-partisan, permanent board of tariff experts and submitted to congress for ratification. The President is not in favor of such a commission. What he does favor is a tariff board that will make such investigations as he orders made and, when it reports to him, he will convey such of its recommendations as he deems advisable to congress in a special message. The commission would report to congress and the public. The board reports to the President alone and only through him, as pleases him, to congress or public. The difference is important. The tariff commission "as advocated by President Taft" is not a tariff commission at all. It is the servant of the executive and not the legislative department.

The Amende Honorable Sometime since The Watchman published a list of legislative candidates for nomination at the direct primary advising whom to support and why. In doing so reference was made to the candidacy of Mr. George A. Wentworth as "a former assemblyman with a bad record." Going back to the sources of information it appears that the bad record was assumed to be true inasmuch as, at that time, Mr. Wentworth had the support of the Crimmins and Kelley faction, the conclusion, not warranted in all cases, being that if he had been a good man he could not have had their support. With such inquiry as we have been able to make it does not appear that Mr. Wentworth's record in the twenty-ninth session was bad. On the contrary he stood for some very good things. Since then he has been little in politics. A desire not to do injustice prompts this explanation.

Our Friends The Democrats Our good friends the Democrats, who have been off the reservation for some months participating in the Republican unpleasantness, in about equal numbers on both sides, are beginning to return home to go through the motions of holding conventions and adopting platforms. In San Francisco there was a most unwonted and even spectacular harmony between the McNab faction and the San Francisco Democratic club. Which faction was on the inside of the other is immaterial. There was peace, tranquility, unanimity and enthusiasm.

The proceedings began, of course, with a rattling of the dry bones of Jefferson and Jackson in a bag. How else would they know that those proceedings were Democratic? It may be noted in passing that Jefferson and Jackson had about as much in common as Theodore Roosevelt and the late Thomas Collier Platt.

Nor have our Democratic friends any very ample justification for biting their thumbs at Republicans because of the latter's belated emancipation from corporation control. The Democrats themselves are so recently born again that they are scarcely dry behind the ears. Honors, and the lack of honors, have been distributed with a non-partisan impartiality. It is not to boast. Remember Jim Budd and how he secured his election. Remember that the San Francisco delegation voted for saloonkeeper Flannery for United States senator. Be humble.

The Watchman On The Party Circle Sometimes The Watchman finds himself afoot and alone. He does in his desire to have the party circle retained. Something like twenty per cent of the voters of San Francisco, and probably over this state and other states, found the primary ballot too much for them and they stamped their tickets hit or miss. Those whose names begin toward the beginning of the alphabet got thousands of votes from that cause alone. It was so in Kansas. In that state judicial candidates whose names began low down in the alphabet were scarcely in the running at all. Of course this defect can be remedied by rotation of the names on an equal number of tickets, but, at best, it leaves elections to chance rather than to design. The short ballot would help, but the shortest ballot that ever was was too long for the ass to note intelligently.

Now, no matter what the influences that dominate political parties, some intelligence has to be used in making up tickets and some consideration has to be paid to public sentiment. The enfranchised ass and blunderhead employ no intelligence and pay no attention to public sentiment. They can't. They don't know how. The safest thing they can do is to attach themselves to some political party and vote its ticket in the only way they can vote it, by stamping one time in the party circle and letting it go at that. This will leave the independent voting to be done by men who outrank the ass in intelligence and the blunderhead in facility with the fingers. The abolition of the party circle is the equivalent of introducing the dice box into our election system. But The Watchman is afoot and alone in this and what's the use of doing any more than just having his say!

California Democracy Not Alone Tempted The report that the Wall street cow has gone dry to the Republican fattened calf, no matter how much bunting it may do, is not unbelievable and the addresses Theodore Roosevelt is delivering are not calculated to increase the lacteal supply. The interests want the next House to be Democratic, and they particularly do not want it to be insurgent Republican, as it will be if it be not Democratic. Therefore, the national Democracy is being taken up into a high mountain to be tempted of the Wall street devil, with Judson Harmon a most interested spectator. But that also is incongruous. In Ohio Judson Harmon is likely to win the election by insurgent Republican votes, only to become a second Alton B. Parker candidate for the presidency with the interests supporting him with money and influence. There is no question that if the Democracy, American and Californian, will compound felonies, accept blood money with which to finance campaigns in a round about way, promise to be "conservative," which, being interpreted, means that it will work the states' rights doctrine for all it can be made worth to prevent all progress of the national government toward effective control—if it will do these things it can be given a good fighting chance to get that party into power again. It is the only chance it has got. Will it take it? Watch! Watch every move, every wink of the eye, shrug of the shoulders. It will bear watching, for are there not politicians in the Democratic party?

The Awful Temptation Now The Watchman is not hinting at anything. He is merely pointing the index finger to the fact when he states that, four years ago, Democracy's only hope lay in insurgency, in throwing the gauntlet at the feet of Mr. Herrin and riding forth to do battle for an emancipated commonwealth. And a right robust campaign they did put up, so robust and inspiring that something like 40,000 Republicans scratched Gillett and voted for Bell for governor. Not one of them ever regretted it.

This time a very high mountain of a different character looms in the prospect and Satan is going to take the Democratic organization to the tip top of it and show it kingdoms that will make Democratic mouths water. Those of them who love party more than state and country are going to make a lunge for the prize. They will be restrained with difficulty. This time the only chance of Democratic success lies in making terms with Mr. Herrin. The boot is on the other foot. The Watchman hopes they will not. The Watchman will go farther and affirm that he believes they will not, but, bless their hearts, they will bear watching! They will be watched as never before. The best possible condition for California is to have both political parties free of corporation domination, both parties clean and strong, and so nearly balanced that a wrong step taken by one will be corrected by the other party.

Heaven grant our Democratic sojourners steadfastness in their, at best, four-year-old faith!

Upon What Shall The Fight Be Made? In this state both parties stand for practically the same principles. Apart from rattling the bones of Jefferson and Jackson, and calling upon the names of Lincoln and Roosevelt, our platforms will not greatly differ. We shall all stand for a modified tariff, not so high as to foster monopoly, not so low as to injure any American industry that really needs protection. We are all for a simplified primary, for free parties and a free commonwealth, for non-partisan election of judges, for better regulation of great corporations, conservation of our national resources, election of United States senators by direct vote and, meantime, a state-wide advisory vote of instruction to the legislators; removal of party circle (from which The Watchman alone dissents); reform of criminal procedure; establishment of a state reformatory for first offenders; an effective employers' liability law, the conservation and regulation of state resources as well as national. In the last legislature that element in the Democratic party that was then dominant stood shoulder to shoulder with that element in the Republican party that is dominant now for all the good things that were accomplished and against all the bad ones that were sought to be accom-

FIRE, THE ARCH-ENEMY OF THE FOREST

By Louis Margolin

It has been estimated by the most competent experts who have made a study of the subject that the stand of timber in the virgin forests of this country will be exhausted within from fifteen to twenty years. That the so-called timber famine is already here in a mild form is indicated by the rapid advance in the price of lumber in recent years. The famine will become more pronounced as the available and more easily accessible forest is cut-over and destroyed. Since the world supply of timber is even now becoming low, and therefore importation from other countries can not be depended upon to any large extent, the future timber supply will necessarily be obtained from the following four sources:

1. Areas of virgin forest considered inaccessible at present but which will be rendered accessible by improved methods of transportation or increased lumber prices.

2. The young growth on cut-over and burned forest land which, if properly protected, will eventually reach a merchantable size.

3. Forest areas managed under proper forest regulation where exploitation is regulated in such a manner as to insure successive cuttings from the same area.

4. Artificial forest plantations.

The amount of timber in virgin forests inaccessible at present but which will be made accessible in the near future is comparatively small and probably will not be a great factor in relieving the hardships of a timber famine. Neither will artificial forest planting affect the situation seriously for a long time to come, since, with two or three exceptions, it takes a tree from 50 to 150 years to reach an exploitable size. Of even greater importance, therefore, than the protection and preservation of the uncut virgin forest is the protection of the cut-over land and the young growth existing upon it, since the vast bulk of the future timber supply will necessarily have to come from this source.

To bring the young trees to merchantable size it is absolutely necessary to keep out fires from the forest. This is so axiomatic and self-evident that it hardly seems necessary to dwell on it, except for statements which have recently appeared in some magazines and papers, that in order to protect the forests from fire it is necessary to burn them over regularly. The arguments given in support of this dangerous theory are as follows: The longer a fire is kept away from a forest the more young trees and forest reproduction appear, and the more debris accumulates from fallen leaves and twigs, and so, when a fire finally does come it is much hotter and burns more readily than it would if the forests were burned over regularly every three or four years. Assuming that the arguments are sound—and it is not at all certain that they are flawless, since common experience has shown that the debris from one fire usually furnishes the fuel for subsequent fires—but granting that repeated fires will decrease the danger from more intense fires, the fact still remains that the forest reproduction and the future forest are thus hopelessly destroyed, and that such repeated fires together with extensive logging operations in the virgin stands will soon reduce the forest land of this country to a treeless region. The main argument in favor of burning over the forests regularly is that it will decrease the cost and trouble of protecting the forests. It may be argued with equal force that since it is troublesome and expensive to raise children, and since children are sometimes a positive source of danger by spreading measles, scarlet fever, diphtheria, etc., it would therefore be well that no more children be raised. Without children there can be no future human race, and without forest reproduction there can be no future forests.

That forest fires are absolutely preventable is not a theory, but an actual fact. The area covered by forest fires in the European countries where there is adequate fire control is almost insignificant, and under similar condi-

A PLAN FOR A FARM CITY

A SUGGESTED SOLUTION OF THE PROBLEM OF CONGESTION

By ELMER ELLSWORTH CAREY

Scholars of economics everywhere note with alarm the growing tendency of the people to desert the country and to gather in the larger centers of population. The congestion and accompanying squalor, misery, vice and the innumerable evils which follow are greatly to be deplored. The effect of such congestion on the health, morality and the well-being of those affected is frightful. How to ameliorate such conditions has long been the problem of humanitarians; the dire effect of overcrowding in the city is patent to the most casual observer. Such congestion is a fertile source of a myriad ills and in this article I will point out a plan for the relief of the intolerable conditions mentioned. I do not believe that the dwellers of the slums and tenement districts can ever be helped or benefited to any appreciable extent so long as they remain in the cities; at least, not unless radical changes are made in our industrial system. All attempts that have so far been made to help the condition of the dwellers in the congested districts have been but palliative. They have not reached the root of the evil and, as a matter of fact, they have simply made matters worse, because the people in question have learned to look to various settlements for aid and by so doing their weakness has been intensified. The only sovereign remedy must be one that strikes at the very root of the trouble.

I propose that we go back to first principles, "Back to the Nature" and seek to remove the city toilers to the country. I will take as a text for this article, "Back to the land."

"But," someone will say, "the average city toiler would not live in the country if you gave him a farm; he craves the excitement, the change and the kaleidoscopic life of the city; he will not go to the country under any conditions. As the light gathers the moths, so the city gathers the flotsam and jetsam of humanity."

This is all too true. If one thousand men were taken from the cities to the country and given suitable employment under fair conditions or even under the most favorable conditions, within six months ninety per cent of them would be back in their old city haunts.

But I believe that an appreciable percentage of the middle classes would leave the city if the plans I propose were carried out. In brief, I propose a "Farm City" on co-operative principles. A city in the country or a farm in the city, just as you choose. The idea is to join the advantages and benefits of farm life with commercial life, and briefly I will tell how it can be done.

Plan Feasible as Business Proposition

To carry out my ideas, it would be necessary for the national government to take as much interest in solving human problems as it does in inspecting carcasses in the packing house; as much interest in rearing healthy children as it does in rearing lady bugs and potatoes. Of course, a philanthropist with large capital at command could inaugurate experiments in a farm city with little chance for financial loss, but I notice that millionaires generally follow the prevailing style in their philanthropic work; custom is strong in philanthropy, even as it is in fashions. My plan should pay three or four per cent on the capital invested.

A farm city should be laid out according to well prepared plans and the city built before a single occupant arrives. The dwelling lots or farms should contain from one to five acres of land each; on each lot should be built a comfortable cottage, with barn, outhouses, fences, etc. Orchards, vineyards, meadows, etc., should be all in order. Every road should be macadamized, cement walks everywhere, trolley cars on every road, or street, as you may call them, should be provided. There should be alleys, sewers, telephones, water system, electric systems for light, heat and power connected with every house; the farm city should be connected with the railroad so that a train of cars containing farm produce could be made up every morning and dispatched to the nearby cities. The center of the farm city should contain the public park, store, public hall, factory, shops, churches, etc.

Peopling the Farms

After the building of such a farm city is completed, the occupants, carefully selected, could step in, take possession and begin the tilling of the soil. The city should be run according to a well-defined program. In a few weeks or months the dairy and produce trains would begin to move out, laden with all kinds of dairy, farm and garden produce, such as eggs, cheese, butter, poultry, etc. For the sake of harmony, it would be best to populate the farm cities according to nationalities or creeds, etc.; if one farm city were populated by Swedes entirely better results would be obtained than if a heterogeneous population were secured; or one farm city could be populated by members of a certain religious denomination. After a farm city had been built to order the farms should be sold on installments to selected families of good character. Everything needed for farming should be provided, even necessary credit at the city store. If all the details of such a city were carried out, I believe that no difficulty would be experienced in securing desirable tenants and I also believe that the investment would pay the projectors a fair rate on the money invested. How much it would pay in terms of philanthropy, generosity, good citizenship, patriotism, in the future well-being of the country and in the uplifting of humanity, I do not know; but I have my opinion. I also think that a millionaire who would institute a series of "Farm Cities" would erect for himself a monument far more enduring than granite, even if it were in the form of ten thousand library buildings.

Farm and City in One

In a farm city the inhabitants would have fresh air, healthy homes, sunshine, flowers, trees, green grass, birds, domestic animals, bees and contentment; there would be no demoralizing influences, no saloons, no cigar-ettes, no viciousness, no gambling, no poverty; the children could go to schools free from vicious surroundings and childhood could be spent amid scenes of enjoyment and pleasure. The farms would be close enough together for social intercourse and the trolley cars would take the family to the theatres, stores, post-office, lectures or socials in the center of the farm city. There should be a band to play two evenings each week, giving open air concerts in the park. Such a farm city would enjoy all the benefits of the country and country life as each lot would practically be a small farm, producing not only all the fruits and vegetables needed for the family, but enough extra to bring in a substantial sum by the end of the year. Such a farm city would possess all the good features of a city with none of the evil.

A model Farm City should consist of a tract of land four or five miles square approximately. This would contain 320 two-acre farms to a square mile. As some families would need four acres you could make the average farm three acres, which would provide for about three thousand farms, each one of which would be capable of supporting three or four persons, giving a total population of about 10,000 souls. The rich lands of the south and west under irrigation are enormously fertile and two acres devoted to truck farming, poultry, etc., would easily support in comfort a small family. Four acres would support a large family. Of course, on these small tracts all the work can be done by the head of the family by hand labor. That it may be understood that I am not romancing, I will state that there is in California a very productive and remunerative farm which consists of one acre and there are many farms containing from four to six acres which yield a substantial income, and an annual profit of from $200 to $500 per acre is not exceptional. Ten acres on the range in three years will produce one $40 steer. In reference to farming, the same land will yield a profit of $5000 to $10,000.

Farm Dimensions

The following table shows the dimension in feet of small farms as they would have to be laid out in a Farm City:

1 acre,	66x660.
2 acres,	132x660.
3 acres,	198x660.
4 acres,	264x660.

A Farm City should be laid out like a city except that in the farm city the blocks would be half a mile square and instead of the lots being 25x75 feet the smallest would be 66x660. The average farm would probably have a frontage of 198 feet and a depth of 660 feet, this being the dimension of a three-acre tract.

A Farm City is simply an ordinary town magnified or enlarged until the smallest lot is capable of maintaining a family when devoted to diversified farming. Of course, it is understood that these figures refer to the south and west where there are no winters and where diversified farming is practiced. All the benefits and conveniences of a town should be provided; such as letter carriers, letter boxes, electric lights, paved streets, cement sidewalks, park, avenues, electric cars, schools, libraries, churches, baths, factories, stores, newspapers, telephones, sewers, etc., etc. The Edison plan for concrete houses could be adopted, making the buildings fireproof and everlasting. By selecting the inhabitants for such a city among the more intelligent of tenement dwellers and by teaching them how to till the soil and by practical help and counsel and by allowing the city a fair measure of self government, I think the problem of keeping the people in the country will be solved. Land for such a city can be had at from $20 to $50 per acre. An irrigation system would add little to the cost and such a system is imperative in "intensified" farming.

The labor question would be solved because each farmer could do his own work and a system of reciprocity would furnish all the additional help that might be needed in emergencies. The laundries, shops, creameries, or cheese factories, would offer work to the younger members of the family who might not be needed at home. The factories could make clothing and furniture for the people and the cheese factory could use the surplus milk, for every three or four-acre farm could maintain a cow.

Enumeration of Advantages

Some additional points regarding distinguishing features and advantages of a Farm City are as follows:

1. Every family will own a home—a small farm.
2. The farm will maintain a family and produce a revenue each year above expenses.
3. By grouping the farms in a city all the objections to country life will be removed.
4. Young people will be satisfied with life in the Farm City as all the attractive features of city life will be retained, such as roller skating, parks, baths, music, theatres, ice-cream parlors, baseball grounds, tennis courts and various other forms of amusement.
5. In the Farm Cities children would be raised under the most favorable conditions, as the charter of such cities would forever forbid the sale of liquors, tobacco, poisonous drugs, vicious literature and all undesirable influences would be barred.
6. By means of the co-operative feature, people would share in the profits arising from the stores, shops, factories, banks, newspapers, etc., and by this means the cost of everything would be reduced to a minimum.
7. Every farm owner would be a shareholder in the corporation and have a voice in the selection of the local officers and in the formation of local government.

8. Such a farm city could make use of the best features of socialism, municipal ownership, co-operative colonies, etc., without infringing on the rights or privileges of the individual.

9. In brief, it is proposed to gather together in one community all the good features of social life, business, government, administration, etc., which already exist in different localities, taking as a basis the idea of farm life.

10. No change in any state laws will be necessary to form a Farm City.

11. In such a community as hereinbefore outlined disease would be practically unknown. With the observance of all sanitary and hygienic laws, with pure air and pure water and an abundant and wholesome food supply in which fruits, grains, vegetables and dairy products would largely enter, with an abundance of pure air, sunshine and freedom from fear, worry, etc., it may be said that the doctor's services would be seldom, if ever, needed.

12. Weekly lectures should be given by the management on all topics pertaining to the welfare of the farm and family.

13. The educational system should embrace instruction in housework, farm work, manual training, practical agriculture and good government. In connection with each school should be several lots devoted to various kinds of farming, in which the boys would be shown the most improved method of diversified and "intensified" farming.

tions the same is true of this country. Since the Forest Service of the U. S. Department of Agriculture has instituted its fire patrol both the number of fires started and the extent of the areas burned over have been materially reduced. As more money becomes available for forest protection there is no doubt that the danger from forest fires in the national forests will be still further reduced, though there is always the great danger from fires starting on the cut-over private land of timber companies, adjoining the government land.

Forest fires are the most unnecessary and the most wasteful form of human carelessness. Probably over 95 per cent of them are preventable. Of the other five per cent, started mostly by lightning, many are extinguished by the rain which often follows the lightning, while the others can and should be detected and extinguished by an efficient patrol before much damage is done. What is needed is an enlightened public sentiment in regard to the danger and absolute needlessness of forest fires, and an effort on the part of all timber owners to prevent these fires. Most of the forest fires are started on the cut-over lands of timber companies who short-sightedly do not consider it worth while to spend the extra money needed for protection. The time is probably not far distant when it will be considered just as illegal to leave slash and debris from logging lying on cut-over forest land as it is now illegal to leave benzine and kerosene soaked rags lying around a dwelling.

Within the last few years there has been a change for the better in the attitude of the more progressive and up-to-date lumbermen. As a result of this enlightened sentiment, forest fire associations have been formed in various states, notably in Washington and Oregon. The members of these associations co-operate with each other and with the forest service in protecting their holdings against fires, at a comparatively low rate of insurance.

In discussing forest fires it should be borne in mind first, last, and at all times:

1. That forest fires are unnecessary and preventable.

2. That repeated fires, regulated or irregular, invariably destroy forest reproduction.

3. That without forest reproduction there can be no future forest and therefore no future timber supply.

whiskers. He is the top of the heap, the little autocrat of this nursery of war. We look away and into the faces of everyday folk about us, farmers, river pilots, professional men, and read a different story. Character, energy, singleness of purpose, the marks of conflict and conscious intelligence grained into their faces by life that means something in a world that is full of all manner of things. We have been interested, yes, but give us the workaday world. We shall look hereafter upon colored bill-posters with more enlightenment and with less allurements. plished. Will the campaign, then, be conducted on issues of fitness of the men put up for the offices to which they aspire? If so, there is no reason why the campaign should not be clean and in good temper. Why not? The only possible reason why is that the Democracy on the mountain, with Satan as guide, may wobble and fall down.

Wilhelm of Germany, who is a man of considerable influence in his own bailiwick, has expressed views on woman's rights which, while they may please some women, will not endear him to suffragettes, nor even to suffragists. In brief, the Kaiser expresses a belief in woman's right to work, and to work in any calling or vocation which may please her. Whether she becomes a doctor, a lawyer, a dentist, a clergyman, works in an office, or does something else, she has both his sanction and his approval. But right there he draws the line; he does not believe in extending the right of suffrage to her.

POP nearly always c'menct 'bout his fire kin'ler sperians by tellin' that his pop died 'bout ten year before, mebbly with the ager, mebbly with the quinine habit, mebbly 'cause the mast seemed to sort 'o pizon that year. Nen his mother died with the Wabash scratches gittin' mixed with the pizon o' wil' parsnip. Nen the 'state bein' settled up pop got his share,—'bout three thousan' acres mos'ly san' burs, hazel break an' forty dollars spot cash. Pop bein' nembitious got to wearin' boots an' swore he was a-goin' to see the worl'.

He saw an ad in our weekly 'bout a wond'ful discov'ry in Sciens. The ad said the scientific worl' was standin' aghast 'bout a non-explodin', nindestructibil and autoramatic fire kin'ler. He sent fer the particulars. Pop said to me one time, "Skid, comin' evens east ther shadders before an' consid'able behin'. The hist'ry o' the worl', at least a part of it, was nentirely changed from that day.

"Skid, I set up the hull night readin' them partic'lars back'ard an' for'ard, up'ard an' in'ard. W'y my hair rared up on en' wen I saw how much them agen's was makin'. One agen sol' six hundred the firs' forty days makin' s'much money he paid fer three years schoolin' at the Valperaiso Normal. A widd'er woman, who had jus' lost one o' her last husban's an' mebbly might 'a' done well if she'd got out th' Indiany habit a-marryin' 'bout ev'ry summer,—she had 'leven children on the county—sol' forty-six the first eight days, 'cludin' evenin's, sixty-four the secon' week, nen seventy-two the follerin' ten days. Nen she checked up. She foun' she had 'nough money to last out mebbly fer two er three husban's more. 'Course not all to onct; she must 'a' took 'em single file. The last heard o' her she had seventeen children all on the supervisors' an' was thinkin' up another husban'." Nen pop scratched his head slow an' thoughtful with 'is thumb nail.

"All widow women natav t'Indiany air always sprintin' after husban's, Skid. If they fail to lan' they take to writin' di'lect po'try er slang. Sence I think, Skid, there was another agen' made s'much money sellin' fire kin'lers that mebbly he was thinkin' of astin' in the neighbors jus' to spen' it. But there was a kingpin seller, a perfessor Whilps, who'd made his pile an' retired 'an' was thinkin' strong 'bout 'rectin' a public library, mebbly jus' to settle his conscience.

"Nex' week w'en I was down at the swamp store who sh'd come mozyin' 'long but the gen'ral agen' himse'f. Talk? He c'd beat a guinea hen with his cackle. The sap was jus' flowin' right anyways, Skid, and in 'bout an hour I was luggin', fifteen mile home, a gunny-sackful o' fire kin'lers on my back. An' say, Skid, my pocket over my lef' hin' laig was lighter by forty dollars. A hull gunnysackful o' them non-explodin', nindestructibil, autoramatic fire kin'lers. Skid, I have wondered a thousan' times w'y I carried 'em home as I had to go back past the store w'en I took out o' the swamp 'long the San'ridge road. Mebbly I was excited, that's not unpossibler. But, Skid, it is eferthoughts like these, that bustin' in on a feller's cerybeltum, w'ich makes 'im wonder w'ich is older in the straterfications, Puffer er monkey."

What kind of a man was "Squire" Puffer, Colonel? Well, I ain't any good discribin' people. Pop weighed two fifty, was six feet two tall, had wiskers that come down to 'is waist, just as shiny as a crow's wing in June, an' he c'd swing over a fourteen han' horse 'ithout tetchin'. An' what's more, he wasn't afraid of the seven horned devils er anything else 'cept a punched up nest o' hornets, them bald faced kin'. They'd take the starch out o' his spinal column quicker'n lightnin'. Onct pop said to me:

"I started out with my tail up, on a trot 'long the San'ridge road, them thirty mile to civilization, 'bout two weeks 'fore Christmas. Each one cost me seventy-five cents and I sold 'em fer one-fifty. That was a case o' petty larc'ny with gran' larc'ny fer dessert. An' takin' 'em altogether they was livin' examples o' before an' after takin'. The secon' day, ridin' west on the Tip-Up railroad, I landed at th' immortal city of Eas' Wolcott. It's the capitol of a country bounded on the south by civilization and on the north by frogs an' swamp devility. It's a hay country between. Th' inhabitants, in th' early times, come out o' th' ark an' some of 'em run on all fours. Lots of 'em had six fingers an' toes. So I'm reliably tol'.

"The first one I got up against was one o' the seeders out o' th' ark. He had embraced civilization an' was deacon, postmaster, school d'rector, spress agent, Justice o' the Peace, th' oldest inhabitant, an' so 'fernal stingy 'at he'd squeeze the tail feathers out o' th' eagle on the dollar, just a holdin' on.

"Efter half a day I had sold 'im a fire kin'ler fer ninety cents. He groaned w'en he paid. W'en he'd make up the fire, he'd open the stove door, have a season o' meditation an' religious doubt and if the fire was real low he'd shet his eyes an' moan pitiful, and about half the time 'd shove the wood in. The ether half he'd slam the door shet an' pet the stick o' wood. He was a mighty near man as mom'd say, Skid.

"The nex' man I sol' to was a fancy farmer called Jedge Jinkins. He was a hay farmer, built som'at like a fat gran'daddy long laigs. He never tetch'd a han' t' anything; he was jus' that full of advice an' pompos'ty. He had wrote po'try, c'd talk in fer'in languages, slung a gol' headed cane an' wore broadcloth. He was always interferin' with 'is cook, tellin' her how to bile potatoes with the jackets on to preserve the nutrition, how to make his pancakes 'roun', an' to use the whites of aigs 'stead o' the yeller fer coffee settlin' and about a thousan' ether things 'at 'd make a live woman take to the swamp, mumblin' on 'er way to death.

"But Jedge Jinkins had one virtue, Skid. He'd stomp out to his hired experts in the hay fiel' ev'ry day to give 'em advice and ether trouble. With his gol' headed cane in one hand an' th' ether flung 'graceful under his coat-tail, flippin' it up now an' then like a catbird, he c'd let out the polites', cuttines', didrapines' perfanity as ever disturbed th' atmosphere of a Nindiany hayfiel'. Even the meanes' man on earth, Skid, has sothin' to 'im. I have always noticed 'them kind o' men air mighty long lived, scarcely ever dyin'.

"W'en I splained to 'im the 'natomy, fysology an' hygeen o' the kin'ler, tellin' 'im it was invented by the prince o' Metheglin of Austerrailway, I'll be gosshammed before I was half through, th' ol' blubberation, po'try an' brimstone, yanked out 'is check book an' writ in four dollars.

"Skid, y'ought to've seen the way he signed 'is name. It looked like a bresh heap afire. The pompous way he done it an' waved me off the hayfiel' 'd make a feller think he was the hull hay crop o' the United States an' mebbly part of Austerrailway. I have that check yit and I look it over once naw'ile w'en I'm lonesome, fer it looks jus' like a burnin' bresh heap afire in a high win'. It was 'bout as val'ble as buckeye soup fer a dead hog.

"Nen learnin' sothin' 'bout th' Eas' Wolcott perfessor, thet's the name fer Indiany school teachers, I surrounded him. They had a habit them times of lickin' the teacher 'bout Christmas time fer the safety of education an' the gen'ral good o' the community. None o' th' inhabitant's 'd think snappin' holidays was orthodox, 'less the teacher was mussed up in a snowdrif' er woozled under the pump, er gen'rally scrambled up with mud er snow an' gittin' a chanct to die with pneumony.

"I guess it was a special providence brung us together. He was a new teacher on his firs' term, th' ether teacher dyin' off efter an experiens of three year. He was a feller weighin' 'bout ninety poun's, havin' two strips er bunches o' wite hair runnin' from his temples way back behin' his ears. The res' was bald. He was 'bout as quick as a weasel an' looked 'siderable like a bal' faced hornet.

"It was the las' day o' school 'fore vacation. Knowin' 'bout the propigatin' o' the pneumony habit, I kind o' run parallel in sellin' him. Says I, 'Perfessor Dicks, I have a new invention fer the pursuance of eddication an' school economy. Wile teachers is tryin' to git the alphabet an' spellin' in the systems of Indiany future poets and ethers as may grow up right as descenden's o' the Roun' Circle, this scientific instrumen' is a mighty fine thing fer c'robortive evidens.' I tell you, Skid, I c'n throw words 'ith any of 'em pervided the 'casion rares up high 'enough. I splained 'bout the two foot handle, the seven poun' asbestic fire en', the case to keep it in an' so on. Nen I broke out bol'.

"Supposin' Perfessor, a boy—er—I mean a pennyroil bull'd come snortin' mad at you. All you'd have to do, pervided you had it red hot, 'd be to stick it in the case 'bout a third full o' gas'lene an' fling it in the bull's count'nance. Nen he said:

"Supposin' he'd come quick an' the kin'ler was col'. Nen what?"

"Percisely," says I. "W'y jus' swing. You c'n scramble up the bigges' pennyroil bull as ever straddled a pawpaw bush in fly time. Nen," says I agin, "Sposin' frinstans, a nunn-rool school boy'd come a-jumpin' at you, I mean jus' supposin' o' course. Supposin' you had it in the crack above the harth, red hot an' the case 'bout a third full o' gas'lene, kind o' hid in the wood by the stove. Supposin' frinstans you was readin' the bible just efter takin' up school an' mebbly three er four natav sons 'd tackle you. Sech a thing is not onreasonable. All a feller 'd have to do 'd be to jerk out the kin'ler, slam it into the gas'lene case an'—"

"I'll take a couple of yer heavier ones, Dr. Puffer," he said, breathing hard. I'll be geedanged, Skid, he said. 'Doctor Puffer.' My heart went out to him then. Just think o' them husky longhaired Indianyans tryin' to woozle up a poor little bal' faced hornet like him! That was jus' miserable.

"As they was to have exercises in th' afternoon, I staid with se'ral ether visitors. I could n't he'p noticin' that a kin'ler was shinin' red hot 'tween the harth an' stove door. Nen I saw the case kind o' hid in the wood by the stove. School was called an' there set the perfessor a-readin' the bible kind o' waitin' fer things to settle down. D'rec'ly in come late 'bout ten of the big chunks o' natav Indiany, lookin' innocent. They done that just to rile him. There they stood inside the door sassy an' waitin' fer the perfessor to look up. Lord, how he did git interested in that bible. Th' ether scholars had been bendin' down studyin' so hard that I c'd see with half an' eye they needed lickin' on gen'ral principles.

"The leader of the boys was a starin', big blue-eyed lunk o' cussidness with teeth like a muskrat—jus' prominan' that way. He shifted from one foot to th' ether waitin' an' winkin' at th' ethers. Lookin' sharp I c'd see the perfessor slippin' a glance over the top of his bible at that red hot kin'ler. Nen a sort o' side gleam at the kin'ler case in the wood. But he jus' kept on readin'. I never saw anything as still as that schoolroom. D'rec'ly the boy, mebbly weighin' two hundred poun', spoke up brazen:

"Teacher, I am 'p'inted t' inform you thet the snowdrifts outside is waitin'. We invite you to have a dive.' That room was stiller 'an ever. I c'd hear the fire a roarin' in the stove and ev'rybody seemed to be holdin' his breath. An' the perfessor jus' kept on readin' bible.

"Perfessor, us boys invite you out adooors

t' enjoy the scenery. Shant you take m' arm, hugh? An' the perfessor was so geedanged interested in bible readin' that he did n't hear th' invite. Nen I saw the leader begin to step up bol' an' nen w'at happened the nex' four secon's I can't fergit in a thousan' years.

"The boys made a rush; the perfessor met 'em with open arms and a bustin' fire kin'ler blazin' an' hissin' like a wash b'iler o' sizzlin', explodin' red-hot snakes. The perfessor begun jabbin', settin' clo's a-smokin' an' burnin' off crops o' pennyroil hair. The room smelt the rest o' th' afternoon fearful. The boys was screamin', yellin' and all tryin' to jam through the door to onct. Seven was headed off an' scared back in the schoolroom. Three took towards Kentlan' scart nigh half to death, th' ethers rammed 'roun' the room feelin' ther heads an' lookin' daft.

"Y'ought to've seen that perfessor go lopin' like a moose elk acrost them snowdrif's. I guess he was n't enjoyin' the scenery any more 'n them three racin' chumps. He mighty soon overtook two an' lef' them settin' in a snowdrif a smokin' an' fightin' ther heads like a boy fightin' mad bumble bees. As the leader got the fir's jab in the house he was flyin' like as if the devil an' Tom Walker was efter 'm. The perfessor stoppin' just a minnit, completely firin' up the two in the snow, he ramped efter the muskrat.

"Though he was 'bout half a mile off we c'd hear the muskrat boy screamin'. Just as the perfessor was stretchin' out his arm atetchin' the boy's haid, they closed out 'roun a ben'. Mighty me-e! that was disappointin'. But sev'ral said they could see a little smoke behin' the trees jus' like an Indian campfire.

"There was another good thing I saw in Eas' Wolcott. That happened nex' mornin' just as I got settled down in my seat on the Tip-Up railroad. I looked out the winder an' saw the stingy ol' dink, that ninety cent 'riginal inhabitant, what had bought my fir's kin'ler. He was jumpin' up an' down an' screamin' 'fire.' His woodshed was burnin' up right gay. Nen I knowed he'd stuck the red-hot kin'ler back in the case 'fore it had got cool."

The way pop 'd sell fire kin'lers was 'bout like this: In the evenin' at the country stores he'd tell stories an' hist'ry o' the Ridge swamp people and ether things. Efter awhile he'd come 'roun' to fire kin'lers. Nen he'd imitate the way most Indianyans 'd build a fire in that part o' the country. Onct at Monticello he made a speech 'bout like this:

"Genlum, d' y'ever see a natav Indianyan git in the kin'lins the night before, specially w'en the weather was snappy? D' y' ever see a human bein', in this part o' the worl', have a woodshed chuck up with stovewood on a col' winter? Specially with dry kin'lins an' mebbly shellbark hickory? D' y' ever see a feller want to climb out 'bout five o'clock w'en it was so col' that the hogs was a-squealin' all night? D' y' ever see this kind of a feller rarin' 'roun' in his shirt-tail tryin' to git the dodging stove a-goin' w'en he was freezin' to death? That's w'at has been the matter with Indiany, I'm reliable tol', fer fifty thousan' years er so. The fir's groun' hog was invented in this state, genlum. W'en he goes to bed d' y' s'pose he's a-comin' out till the weather gits kind o' sof? Well I jus' should snickernix. A groun' hog some say is the reg'lar 'riginal inhabitant of Indiany. Genlum, s'pose you'd wake up and yer beard was froze to the feather tick with 'bout a minch of ice. S'posin' you c'd see the snow flirtin' long the floor; nen remember'n' there was no wood chopped, no dry kin'lins to be had, an' mebbly what wood you had was mos'ly green, an' mos'ly covered with snow an' sleet: s'posin' you c'd hear the horses a-kickin' the stalls to pieces jus' tryin' to keep warm; s'posin' you was a man of influens an' knowed you'd have to git up er the stock would starve er freeze to death; s'posin' w'y—w'y say, genlum, ain't it hell?

"Now, genlum, s'posin' you had one o' these mindestructibil, non-explodin' autaramatic fire kin'lers, w'ich costs you on'y two dollars, jus' w'at could you do under sech sorrowful circumstances, jus' w'at could you do? That's w'at I ast in thunder tones. Why, cautious breakin' th' ice off yer beard from the feather tick, takin' a big breath, ram-m-m out o' bed, spring over the little snow drif's, grab off the stove leds, slam w'at wood you have in the stove, slap on the stove leds, jerk the kin'ler out of the coal ile case, snap a match to it, jamb the kin'ler through the crack o' the harth, Bull Run back to the feather ticks an' let 'er ro-o-ar. D'rec'ly you'd have to kick off leas' one o' the feather ticks fer you'll be sweatin' like thunderation.

"Genlum, that's its on'y fault—the ro-o-ar an' the heatin' an' the smotherin'. You jus' got to git up an' yank the kin'ler out er it'll burn till noon, efter it gits started, clean till noon. Y'never have to git a nax to chop up the sossage, never have to git in kin'lins, dry wood be goldurned, w'y sometimes I kind o' think a feller c'd purty near burn up a snow-drif."

Lots o' people didn't min' payin' two dollars 'cause some of 'em said pop's talk was worth least a dollar. The bigges' business he done, in them early times, was 'roun' Monty, where he got in with the supervisors, givin' 'em a rake off. That's in White County where the fir's track was laid north t'wards Canady. Later on Pop said most ev'ry county had a trail north.

At Logansport, right in the center o' the pennyroil district, he sol' two hundred an' forty. That was the place where the pennyroil cow was monarch of all she c'd survey, pop said. In them early times th' inhabitants hadn't givin' up pennyroil milk so's they could write d'lect an' po'try. At milkin' time if the cows didn't come home nachural, er wasn't tame enough to lasso, you had to run 'em down with long laiged dogs.

Pop said the hardes' thing he had to buck aginst was w'en them farmers 'd be 'roun' the stove a-talkin' governmen' questions er w'en they got to goin' 'bout 'rithmetic questions. I remember two w'ich at times 'd git 'em so frothy that they'd have to go out adoors to finish. One question was about a hen and a half layin' a naig and a half. Th' ether was about the squirl on a tree. If a man had a fool squirl help doin' 'is 'rithmetic fer 'im, that is if the squirl was on the furside of a tree. Nen if a man walkin' fur out 'd slip 'roun' through the pennyroil, spanish needles an' beggarlice an' the squirl'd keep jus' out o' sight as he sneaked 'roun' the tree, an' s'posin' they both like goldang ijuits 'd keep goin' gran' right an' lef' that way till both had made the circle, nen a feller'd ast, "Does the man go 'pletely 'roun' that gol dinged squirl?" To'ards the las' the younger descendens got to killin' off fellers as'd ast them kind o' questions. Nen the country got t' improvin'.

All pop tried to do, if they got to goin' hard, was to try to switch 'em off to, "Which has the most enjoymen', 'Pursuit er possession?" Nen pop if he got 'em goin' he'd example 'em with the kin'ler. Pop said he had a perfec' orgy a-sellin' kin'lers along the Wabash, even wen spring begun to kill the fruit trees off as usual. Pop said he never did jus' know w'ether it was the frost that killed the blossoms ev'ry spring, er w'ether it was 'cause most apple an' pear trees hadn't been pruned fer three er four gen'rations of inhabitants. Gen'rally, most orchards 'long the Wabash looked like a bresh heap stood up on end t'air out.

Pop said w'en he druv up to a place an' he saw 'bout fifteen dogs an' childern, with the women smokin' iron clay pipes, havin' an acorn knob o' hair settin' on the back o' ther heads, he knowed mighty certain he'd git away with more'n a dollar in his butternuts. He has sol' to deaf and dumb people, jus' with imitatin' a natav Indianyan makin' a fire on a ripsnortin' winter mornin' an' tryin' not to freeze to death. His unfailin' rule was a kin'ler t'any man w'ich had wrinkles an' freckles on 'is neck, an' hair that hadn't been cut sence the last county fair. One of 'is sellin' p'int was to git a sneak glancet under the hair.

Pop showed the special things the kin'ler was good fer, as brandin' stock, fer Fourth o' July and Christmas doin's, fer killin' groun' moles jus by stickin' it in ther holes an' stranglin' 'em to death 'ith the pizonous gas. Fer burnin' out hornets nes' an' cleanin' up breshy lan' it was a special providens. An Irishman, w'ich like all of 'em way back in the timber, is always 'spicious o' strangers till they git sothin' in ther system as loosens 'em up, 'specially w'iskey, ast pop onct, "Mr. Poofer, how an' the devil whin ye dhraw the

State Commission of Horticulture

There is a theory of government that holds that government has done its whole duty to the people it governs when it has preserved order and established justice. There is another theory that adds to these functions the advancing of the common welfare. It is needless to state that American governments, among them the government of California, believe in trying to advance the general welfare from the general purse. It is not easy to do this. It is sometimes much easier to spend money than to produce good results from the expenditure, as California has learned to its cost.

It was early discovered that California was to become a great horticultural state and the state early began to help that industry upon its feet. It was slow work. Every fruit undertaken to be grown soon had one or more besetting pests and there were few expert orchardists, vineyardists or scientists to grapple with the problems growing out of the fruit industry.

Thirty years ago the state constituted a Viticultural Commission of eight persons and, three years later, a State Board of Horticulture of nine. How they did fight! They were liberal spenders of public moneys and the results gained were not satisfactory. The act providing for the Viticultural Commission was repealed in 1895, and the State Board of Horticulture went out of existence in 1903.

But the state did not forego the attempt to help these interests on. It abandoned the commission and board idea and, in 1903, constituted a State Horticultural Commissioner. The wisdom of this has been proven by results. One man can do better than a commission of eight or a board of nine. If he be capable he can be much more efficient. The tendency in all activities of government is now toward the department with a superintendent answerable to the governor of the state rather than toward a numerous body with divided responsibilities and likely to be at cross purposes within its own membership. A department with a superintendent and subordinates can be held to a strict accountability by the governor and through the governor to the people.

The State Horticultural Commissioner has a main office at the state capitol at Sacramento, from which the work is directed, and a quarantine office at San Francisco. The main office answers questions that puzzle fruit growers over the state, holds conventions of fruit growers, publishes bulletins and leaflets and furnishes information to the press for the public in general. Inspectors are sent wherever new difficulties arise and investigations are made. If there be need for it, districts, whole counties or special orchards are quarantined so as to prevent the spread of pests or diseases.

At San Francisco is the main quarantine office with a chief and two assistant inspectors. They inspect ships that come in from foreign countries to see that infected plants are not introduced. They also search shipments of trees and shrubs brought to California from other states.

Then there is an insectary division for the discovery in our own state of such insects as are the natural enemies of other insects that are injurious to fruits and vines. Such insects are propagated and distributed where they are needed. Imported insects found useful in preying upon pestiferous insects are also propagated and distributed in colonies where needed.

It has been discovered that nature will, if she can, maintain such a balance in her insect life as to render mankind the maximum of good and the minimum of harm, but sometimes an insect gets imported without its attendant and limiting adversary. Then great mischief results and the injurious insect must be traced to his original habitat and his natural enemy discovered and imported to hold him in check. For this work the State Horticultural Commissioner keeps one man traveling over the surface of the earth wherever duty calls him hunting for enemies to the enemies of California's fruit and vine interests. This has proven very profitable to the state, which ships out of the state tens of thousands of carloads of fruits that bring back millions of dollars to advance the general prosperity. Perhaps this could not be done if the state did not strive to advance the general welfare in this way.

This office costs the state $27,500 a year, and it repays its cost many times over. The governor appoints the commissioner and holds him responsible for results flowing from his office. The commissioner appoints his deputies and holds them responsible to him for the conduct of each department of the office. The people, in turn, hold the state administration, and the political party in power, responsible for all of them. This is in line with the best tendencies in the organization of the state government.

The Sun

THE SUN, LONG PREDICTED, began to shine in San Francisco September 3. It is not to be judged by its first or thirty-first attempt. It requires time for any new journalistic enterprise to discover itself and strike its gait. The public should be patient. The California Weekly will be. It is right that The Sun be constructively Democratic, as the other papers are constructively Republican or Doodle-Dee, but the party organ idea is out of joint with our time. San Francisco needs a morning paper that will print all the news that is fit to print, that will not sell its news columns or editorial influence, and will love truth better than party advantage. If The Sun shall be such a paper it will find itself warmly welcomed. Here's hoping that it may.

What Of That Jury?

THAT BALLINGER BE WHITEWASHED, unwashed or painted ebony by the tribunal before whom he was tried is of little moment to The California Weekly. The status of Ballinger is as fixed in our national history as that of that Belknap that disgraced the office before him. Our lament is that the august jurors, chosen from among our legislative great, should stand at the close of the investigation as they notoriously stood before it opened, seven to five. If big men prove themselves so little what hope have we that little men shall ever prove big enough to judge impartially according to law and evidence? Anything less than a unanimous decision in that case will disgrace American statesmanship.

Joseph Hutchinson

IT IS SELDOM THAT THE WORLD loses aught by suicide. The melancholy act that deprived California of Joseph Hutchinson, and The California Weekly corporation of its honored vice-president, was an exception. Nervous prostration, while not stigmatic as is insanity, is more to be dreaded by the sick man than a thousand devils by them that are whole. It was from that cause that he came to his end. Keen of intellect, warm of heart and sympathetic with all high purposes, we have encountered a misfortune long to be remembered with regret.

Woman Suffrage

DOWN DEEP MOST MEN at once favor woman suffrage and fear it. They love women, and respect their intellectual prowess, with reason, but they hesitate to impose upon them the burdens of state, the more especially in the fear that the burden will not be generally assumed. They cannot look with indifference upon doubling the constituency of the indifferent. Nevertheless, it is right that the issue should come on for reargument as often as once in sixteen years and, in declaring for its resubmission to the manhood of California for a rehearing the Republican state convention acted justly if with less than a wordly wisdom.

Bell's Bad Break

AT STOCKTON THEODORE BELL declared that when taxes increase out of proportion to population it is notice that something is wrong. Not so. It only may be. If taxes do not increase out of proportion to population it is notice that there is something wrong. Taxes are taken from the prosperous few for the common benefit and they should increase as wealth increases. Even the standard of municipal living should rise, and taxes should tend to verge upon the danger of hampering productive enterprise by consuming productive capital. Not until there are all the parks and playgrounds, free baths and boulevards, open art galleries and endowed theatres, civic buildings, hospitals for the sick and homes for the aged, that our common citizenry have need for should public taxation be crowded much below the point where productive capital begins to be encroached upon. Evidently there are things which Mr. Bell does not know. "Do we get a dollar of value for every dollar taken in taxes?" That is the real question, Mr. Bell.

Exit Wild and Woolly

CERTAIN WILD AND WOOLLY GOVERNORS put their heads together and prepared to teach the Conservation Congress what is what. They went home before the congress adjourned, having been taught what is what themselves. Pinchot pitched into them, even the President did not seem to favor them, and Theodore Roosevelt finished them. Render to Uncle Sam the things that are Uncle Sam's and to the states the things that are the states'—when the states have made themselves fit to be trusted with that responsibility. Let them first take care of what is undisputedly within their own exclusive jurisdictions. That will keep them all busy for a decade.

Meyer Lissner

WATCH THIS MAN. He possesses all the political acumen of a Ruff with all the public spirit of a Folk or a Pinchot. He is as good an organizer as Herrin with as high standards of public morals as Theodore Roosevelt himself. His strength lies in seeing clearly and pointing the way so that those about him see as clearly as himself. He is a leader not a driver, a captain not a boss. All bad men hate him and the better good men come to know him the greater confidence will they have in him. No mistake was made in making Meyer Lissner chairman of the Republican State Central Committee. The party will hardly know itself under such leadership.

The Right To Scratch

A PLURALITY OF REPUBLICANS placed a certain state ticket in the field. A plurality of Republicans delegated authority to certain of their number to declare a platform and use all honorable means to secure the election of that ticket. That committee so commissioned must stand to its guns and do its best for all party candidates. No other course would be honorably representative of the popular will. But when it comes to us voters, and even to the committeemen as voters, that is an issue betwixt our God and each of us, and the Republican who does not scratch his ticket until he makes it straight is recreant to his trust. Judge the committee as a committee, and the men who compose it as men, that is the enlightened view to take.

Three Score Years

IT IS NOT WELL FOR A MAN to forget the anniversary of his wedding day, nor for a state to cease to regard the day it was admitted into the Union of states. This is a great experiment we are engaged in making. Only the unthinking think the problem solved and their thinking goes no deeper than the cortex of the brain. But hope sees six-and-forty stars already in the firmament and the aided vision discerns two more. A great experiment! It is good to be alive to have a hand in it. Rah, for Admission day, rah! rah! rah!

Two Views of Conservation

Two great conservation addresses were delivered at St. Paul this week, one by the President, the other by Theodore Roosevelt. The addresses were characteristic of the two men and show what radically differing types they are.

The address of the President was restrained, abounding in modified statements and inferential beliefs rather than downright contentions. He made bold to venture some opinions so universally conceded that no one would think of contradicting one of them, such as, that the resources of the nation are for use not abuse, that their use by capitalists must be under such public control as will prevent monopoly and extortion, that our laws are not now sufficient to that end, that congress should enact remedial legislation and should do so at the coming short session, that control and not revenue is the essential principle. The most timid might venture these opinions with impunity.

With reference to the disposal of national power sites the President contented himself with stating the case to the people as he might have done from the bench to a jury, or have stipulated in an agreed case to a higher court. He finds the problem abounding in interesting legal niceties. The nation owns the banks to certain streams without the use of which no power can be developed. The riparian proprietor owns the right to have the water flow by his home undiminished in quantity, but he has no right to the power which the flowing may develop. The state owns the power if any shall be developed, but neither banks nor riparian rights. Which is boss? The President is woe to think that the national government may not be, but does not declare that it is. A fine puzzle with which learned periwigs may fill tomes with hairs nicely split while industry waits for the cobwebs of learning to be brushed aside by a rude, but constructive hand!

As the President seemingly sees it, although he is not specific on the subject, there are two contentions between which congress, not he, must render decision. One is whether or not the national government shall lease its power sites directly to those who would put them to use on terms such as: that leases shall run for no longer than fifty years, that combination in restraint of free competition shall be prohibited; that extortion shall not be allowed and that, to that end, rates charged for use of power shall be readjusted from time to time, say at intervals of ten years. That is one side of the case.

The other is like unto it, except that the nation shall cede these power sites to the states in which they are situate with covenants in the Act of Cession that the sites be leased on exactly the same terms as first above suggested, failure to carry out which shall result in forfeiture to the nation not only of the lease, but the works created.

It is respectfully submitted that the difference to the lessee involved in this great issue is the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. In either case the lessee is subject to exactly the same restrictions, the only difference being that, in the first instance, he deals directly with the government, while, in the second, he deals with the government indirectly through the state, which conceivably might impose additional restrictions but would have no power to modify any. The plight of the power customer is also exactly the same, provided that the state keep faith with the covenant made with the government. There is the rub if there be any. In the disposal of the swamp lands the states broke faith with the government and the government had no remedy. The lands were deeded in fee simple, and were not reclaimed as the states had covenanted with the government that they should be.

But the President will find to his sorrow that state control means no such thing as he has outlined, that it will involve an absolute cession of the governmental title to the states with no effective restrictions whatever remaining in the hand of the national government. It will be state or nation, one or other, now and forever.

Now what did Theodore Roosevelt say on the subject? Epitomized, just this: "The essential question is not one of hair-splitting legal technicalities. It is, Who can best regulate the special interests for the common good? A prime object of the grasping and greedy is to avoid any effective control either by state or nation. They advocate state control because they believe it will be least effective. The nation is stronger and its jurisdiction more effective. The predatory corporations are interstate. Therefore the control over them must be interstate. The most effective weapon against these aggressive interests will be federal laws and the federal executive."

No trouble to understand that! Theodore Roosevelt knows where the line is drawn and he is ready to toe the mark and fight it out on that line if it takes all summer, fall, winter and spring. The President is the judge, always the judge. Theodore Roosevelt is always the militant warrior waging "bully fights" for Right Things as he understands them. The one makes right decisions, the other makes right fights. If the President were Chief Justice and Roosevelt were President things would go better.

Our Friends The Railroads

A better understanding between people and railroads is desirable. There is no more reason in the nature of things why the railroads and the people they serve should be continuously at war than there is for any gentleman being at war with his coachman or his chauffeur. A more perfect understanding will make for a more perfect peace, and the more hearings held in public by the Interstate Commerce Commission the better will be the understanding.

This is not saying that either the people or the railroads are right as right can be, and that everything would be lovely if each could put himself in the other's place just as it is. That would not be true. Neither the railroads nor the people are now wholly in the right, but they would get right if they understood each other better. They would have to.

When a man like President Ripley of the Santa Fe is put forward as an exemplar of the railroad view of the railroad question and declares: that freight rates are absurdly low, that extortion has never been practiced, that the "what the traffic will bear" theory of fixing rates is the correct one and that the railroads should be unhampered in the application of that rule, we know that the railroad view is untenable.

When, also, railroads, in order to maintain their views in application seek to subvert government, control courts, resist regulation and advise all their employees to vote against all candidates proposing to regulate railroads in the public interest we know that the practice of railroads is as unsound as their philosophy and that there cannot be peace until they change their methods.

There is a great deal that the people do not know about railroading, but there is at least one thing that the railroad men do not know about the American people, unless they are just beginning to find it out. That is that the people can not be ridden over rough-shod, cannot have their legislatures systematically debauched, and their courts manipulated, without creating such a revolution as will make the railroads suppliants rather than autocrats. That much the railroad men must be taught at whatever cost to themselves or their country.

What the people do not know about the railroads is mainly how they are financed, where the money that goes into betterments comes from, or ought to come from, and upon what capitalization the people pay dividends or ought to pay them. Mr. Ripley has thrown some light on this subject.

He affirms that betterments and terminal facilities should not be paid for out of capital, but out of earnings over and above reasonable dividends to stockholders. This contention is sound if the betterments so made are not capitalized, that is, if they do not have issued against them shares of stock to be distributed to the shareholders as stock dividends upon which they are to receive interest ever after. Mr. Ripley lately declared that the Santa Fe company has expended forty millions in betterments that have not been so capitalized and made an interest bearing asset of the stockholders. If so, good.

The American people are not thick headed. They can be made clearly to understand that the betterments which the patrons of a railroad pay for should belong to the patrons of the road and not to the road itself in the sense that its stockholders would have a right to charge interest against them. Can the railroad operators be made to understand that, too? If they can and will agree faithfully to respect such rights on the part of the patrons of their roads, the people will be well reconciled to the earning of a round surplus over and above a fair rate of interest, that surplus to be devoted to new stations, safer roadbeds, more life saving appliances and better service. President Ripley demands that, if six per cent be paid in dividends, six per cent more should go into betterments.

That seems reasonable. The patrons of the Santa Fe will not object to it, provided that they do not have first to create the improvements and then pay interest on them ever after. Let it be so nominated in the laws and enforced by the Interstate Commerce Commission, then we shall all be content and at least one bone of contention will have been eliminated.

The issues involved are all elemental. They can be understood. All they need is clearly to be stated to be fairly decided. Then, if the decisions be faithfully observed, we shall have amity and comity with "Our Friends the Railroads."

The Fiesta Spirit

"The fiesta spirit is very strong in San Francisco," remarked one who for many years has had his fingers close to the San Francisco pulse. So it is. It is not a bad spirit to keep alive, but it is a wonderfully poor kind of spirit upon which to lay the foundation of a great city. It was cultivated in Venice for not less than ten consecutive centuries, the more assiduously as special interests came increasingly to aspire to control. It helped to keep the common people interested in something diverting while the special interests went through their pockets and filched away their sovereignty.

It made Venice the smartest city in Europe. Its "smart sets" were quite the swiftest and its night life the most entertaining. Venice was succeeded by Paris, which has cultivated the fiesta spirit assiduously, and there are those who have wanted San Francisco to become the Paris of America. That spirit scatters "chink" and keeps the cafes, the theatres and the hotels and apartment houses brimming. A great transient clientele of spenders is a resource not to be despised. We must all admit that.

But the fiesta spirit is the spirit of gaiety, not of happiness. Its purpose is to eat, drink and be merry lest tomorrow we die. Those who foster it have in mind the purpose of fetching the whole state to town to spend its loose change, as often as it has any, and so stimulate petty trade. It is hard to mouth and, when hard times come, all the finery and gaiety of it are as insubstantial as a dream. They vanish, leaving behind but poverty and the wolf.

The fiesta spirit is mercenary rather than commercial. It swells the passenger rather than the freight traffic. It creates few chimneys and furnaces and sets no ponderous machinery humming. It sends few argosies over the seas. Its habitat is in happy-go-lucky southern Europe, not in Glasgow or Liverpool, Berlin or London. It is ephemeral and unworthy of the best product of serious minded men. It is the fiesta spirit and not the spirit of commercial and industrial enterprise that is promoting the Panama-Pacific exposition as if the future of San Francisco depended upon it, which it does not. The future of San Francisco depends upon the establishment of commercial arteries that ramify the western half of the earth, upon the utilization in manufacture of the three-and-thirty-million of horsepower pouring, unused, from the summits of the Sierras.

Not that the fiesta spirit is not good. It is good in its place, good for an occasional gala day, good to break the grim monotony of a workaday world, but it should be the dessert and not the staple of diet; the benediction, not the service that uplifts and strengthens. "The fiesta spirit is strong in San Francisco," strong enough as it is. It needs no fostering. What does need fostering is that broad commercial spirit that has development and not The Cinch for its object, the spirit to redeem deserts and swamps, rectify rivers, construct canals and show the people of California how to make a dollar rather than how to cover into one's coffers some dollar that some one else has made.

Buying Their Freedom

In negro slavery days many a black man bought his own freedom and, afterward, that of his family. A kind master gave them one day in the week to work for themselves. With the earnings of that day they bought another free day and then a third, and, finally, all the days of the week, after which they bought a free day for the wife, and another and another until she became a free woman, when the two doubled teams and bought their children. By this means there came to be so many free negroes in the south as to be a menace to slavery.

We hear much of wage slavery. Our modern wage system is a species of slavery, for the worker is dependent upon the man who owns the tools and the opportunity to labor. There cannot be entire freedom until the worker owns the tools and that opportunity. How can he acquire them? That is one of the great problems of our day. Another equally great is, how can he continue the business after he shall have acquired the tools? He must somehow learn that or little good will the tools do him. He will be little better off than the very small boy with a very large hatchet turned loose in an orchard.

The first half of this dual problem was worked out four score years ago by many a black "daddy" and "mammy" working together. May not their white brother and sister do as well if they try?

The writer has in mind a factory employing four hundred hands and worth a hundred thousand dollars. It would necessitate some deprivation, some "cutting out" of the beer and pretzels, the vaudeville and car rides, to accomplish it, but if the workers in that factory were fighting for freedom for themselves and their families, as many a black family fought for theirs, they could lay by fifty cents each working day. This would mean $200 per day, $1,200 per week, $60,000 a year, allowing for holidays, or sufficient in two years to buy the whole plant outright and pay a considerable bonus for the privilege.

It is estimated that there were 40,000 workmen in the labor day procession in San Francisco Monday. It would be possible, close scrimping perhaps but possible, if they knew that they were buying their freedom, for those men to have, on an average, fifty cents per working day each, $20,000 all told, $120,000 per week, or, allowing for holidays, $6,000,000 a year. How long would it take them at that rate to buy out all the industrial plants in San Francisco and become the owners of their own tools? Certainly less time than it required any black "daddy" to earn the emancipation of his black family.

But it is one thing to own the tools and it is quite another to be able to use them co-operatively! Perhaps unionism may teach men how to trust each other, how to submit to authority constituted by themselves and so bring a sound discretion to bear upon collective enterprises. If so, well and good. If not so, then that lesson must be learned some other how or labor can never be emancipated, can never be very far from dependence and subservience.

For the wage system stands next to the slavery system in that it not only does not possess the resources needful for its own employment, but it shirks the responsibilities of employment. In shirking those responsibilities, it likewise shirks the very experiences that develop strength, capacity, power. The slave takes no heed for how he shall be fed or clothed or housed. The wage earner takes no heed for where his wage fund is to come from, but only that he shall be employed when it suits him to work at what it suits him to receive. Such lack of responsibility is incompatible with industrial freedom, and the price of that freedom must be the burden which the capitalist now bears, that of ways-and means, the securing of the raw material, the disposal of the product, the financing of enterprise.

Were those labor day processions marching toward the assumption of that responsibility or away from it? Will some one who knows be good enough to reply?

Are They Getting Ready?

Boston national banks have formed an association under the Vreeland emergency currency act of two years ago, the New York banks took similar action some time since and there are other movements in the same direction elsewhere. That act is not what the safety of the nation requires, but it is better for stopping a panic than unlegalized clearing house certificates. Is the banking world looking for another visitation that it is making this preparation?

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Did it ever occur to the reader that he is in fact a special creation of the Almighty? If he have an exaggerated ego it probably has. If he be a "common mortal" he may regard himself as very common but he is not. There is not in all the world another like him, never was and never will be. Moreover, he will go through all eternity a thing apart, much alone. The nearest and dearest friend he has on earth will be separated from him by an impassable barrier. His personality will still be his own.

There is, from this cause, a deep sense of loneliness that comes to all of us. There are times when each of us feels that no one understands us, no one truly sympathizes with us, no one sees things as we do, and we allow ourselves to be made unhappy by the thought.

And yet this individualization is our most priceless heritage. It insures us eternal life. It guarantees us against being absorbed into anything short of the infinite. We shall be ourselves, not alone while the world stands, but while the heavens endure. We shall not be always as we are now, as we are not now what we were a decade ago or a year ago, but our identity will be preserved. We shall have our chance to make of ourselves something unique in all creation, but we shall have our lone watches while the universe endures. No one, except the God who made us, will ever understand us.

Do we recognize, and value at its worth, this priceless personality of ours? What is more important, do we recognize and value, and respect, the sacredness of personality of others? How sacred did The Christ recognize it! "Behold I stand at the door and knock," he said. Behold, then, The Man, the ideal of the race, the most puissant power in all the history of humanity, not venturing to intrude upon the privacy of the individual soul except that soul bid him enter in! What right have we, then, to thrust ourselves upon even the humblest of God's creatures, our opinions, our concepts of what they should become and do? Upon no account should we venture to do more than to stand at the door and knock, just loud enough to be heard, waiting for the word before we seek to enter into intimacy with even our own offspring.

Many a mother, gazing into the eyes of the babe at her breast says in her heart, "This is mine, born of my body, flesh of my flesh, mine to be answerable for, mine to make of what I will." She is mistaken. The babe is hers only in a qualified sense. It is hers to nourish, to lead, to surround with conditions favorable to growth, hers as her rose garden is hers, to be tended, watered, fertilized, but the "W. A. Richardson" will still be the "W. A. Richardson," and the "Cherokee" the "Cherokee," luxuriant and beautiful or mildewed and unattractive as she shall discharge her duty toward her rose garden, but every rose in it will persist to be what it is. Its individuality will be preserved, and it should be.

But the preservation of the individuality of the child is a million times more important than that of all the rose gardens that ever were. We cannot break it down if we would, but we can better the doors to its soul, we can disturb its tranquility, hinder its development after its kind, starve it, smother it, annoy it and make it uncomfortable, we can dwarf it and fill it full of ill health and morbidity, break its spirit, clip its wings, render it dependent. We can harm it for this life and send it to the next decrepit, misshapen and unprepared, but we cannot swallow it, assimilate it, make it our own. Though its body be begotten or born of our body, nevertheless it will be and persist to be as much a separate creation as this world is separate from other worlds. If we could get this truth into us how differently would our treatment be of those committed to our care! How much less satisfaction would we feel in being able to impose our strong will upon the weaker, but, not unlikely, equally healthy ones in our charge.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

The Latest in Begging

The "dummy racket" is the latest thing in artistic beggary, and is now at the height of its popularity amongst the "burles" or "huskies" who are the aristocrats of mendicancy. The "burles," by the way, look down on the "mush fakirs" whose attack on the "jungle"—which means every place except New York, Chicago and San Francisco—consists in "battering privates" only on the lowly village or rural "poultice route." The "burley" wants a "hand-out," but he must get it as a "set down," that is, be shown to a table and given a full meal, ending with pie. The "mush fakir" is content with bread and the doorstep.

But the more artistic of the "burles" make a good living in the cities, "plinging" able-bodied on the main stem," that is, collecting money from prosperous-looking people. There are no less than 500,000 beggars in the United States at the present time. Among them the "dummy racket" is the latest and most profitable scheme. It consists simply in the "burley's" determination not to speak nor seem to hear. He poses as a deaf-mute, in other words, and hands out a printed card with a sorrowful verse on it, asking for aid.

This, and much more interesting and illuminating information is contained in the first annual report of the National Association for the Prevention of Mendicancy and Charitable Imposture. James Forbes, the director of the society, has offices in New York, and is constantly called on by the police of eastern cities to help ferret out such impostures.

Americans and "Old Masters"

The suspicion has been abroad for some time that there were an astonishing number of "genuine old masters" in American galleries. We have become so accustomed to pride ourselves upon the enterprise of our wealthy people in getting the choicest paintings of the old world right out from under the noses of the connoisseurs of Europe, by the simple expedient of accepting the dictum, "They come high, but we must have them," that we have failed to check up the figures on these importations and have scoffed at the effete art lovers of Europe who told us we were being played for suckers. But when somebody figured up that there were some thousands of "genuine" Rembrandts and Corots and Mauves in the United States, while the number of these same masters' works in European galleries remained undiminished, we began to have our doubts. Now comes a case that seems to prove conclusively that our touching tribute of faith in the productive powers of great artists is a misplaced faith and that the most touching part of the whole business is the "touching" of American purses by guileful European art dealers. In this case M. Carrier Belleuse, the French artist, was appointed by the French courts as an expert to pronounce upon the value of the paintings composing the gallery of Mrs. Hamilton Paine of Boston, and he has arrived at some conclusions not at all flattering to American purchasers of pictures. Mrs. Hamilton Paine brought an action against a pseudo French nobleman, said in reality to be the son of a London tailor, whom she accused of selling her at inflated prices a number of "old masters" which turned out to be clever frauds.

"What astonishes me is the simplicity of these Americans," says M. Carrier Belleuse. "After seeing some of the abominable paintings which composed Mrs. Hamilton Paine's gallery I cannot understand the error of the victim. A child would not have been taken in. It is certain that these worthy foreigners have a great deal of money, but they are entirely lacking in artistic sense."

That quotation hurts, probably because it is largely true. And the question arises, Why did Mrs. Paine, and why do others, buy these pictures? Do they really enjoy them? Or do they just want them to make a display? The answer is pretty obvious, and that hurts, too.

Enormous Business in Talking Machines

The man who invented and who still controls the manufacture of the Victor talking machines is Eldredge Reeves Johnson, a native of Delaware. He was born forty-three years ago. Without financial means to obtain a college education, Johnson drifted to Camden, N. J., where he worked at the bench in a machine shop. Later he drifted to the far West, which he did not like and where he had the unpleasant experience of going broke. Returning to Camden, he went into partnership with a friend, starting business with a capital of 50 cents each. The firm ran a machine shop in a room seventeen feet square. Johnson invented a wheat cleaner that afterwards made a fortune for other men. He invented a ramp burner that was a failure. Then he set about to take the squeak out of phonograph records, at that time regarded as a toy.

That was twelve years ago. The experiments of several years produced the perfected Victor talking machine. In 1901, Johnson's company sold $3,000,000 worth of them. In 1903, the sales had doubled. In 1905, the sales amounted to $12,000,000; in 1907, to $27,000,000. The panic dropped them 25 per cent, but in 1909 they were again $27,000,000, and this year's sales will exceed $30,000,000. Pretty good twelve years' work.

Japan's Great Commercial Growth

An English observer in the Far East notes that Japan is steadily forging ahead in the race for commercial greatness. He declares that she has passed the stage of "muck and truck" commerce, and now deals in all the modern elements of commerce on a dignified scale. She has not yet originated much, but she has shown originality in her imitation of foreign products. This imitation has, however, been disgraced by the grossest forgery of trade marks, which still continues.

Japanese coal controls the markets east of Colombo. Japanese vessels are rapidly driving English vessels from the China coast trade. Japan is in much the strategic position toward China, commercially, that England occupies toward Europe.

This observer finds reason to be apprehensive of the financial future of Japan. The heavy loan indebtedness of the Japanese government, her need for raising millions more for railways, and the poor administration of her finances, he thinks are bound to react upon the economic development of the empire. He finds an importunate cry for capital, but discourages individual investment by foreigners.

A dark side of the picture of her commercial progress is this observer's view of the spoiling of the aesthetic side of Japanese life and the submersion of the laboring class. He says of these things:

"From the aesthetic standpoint the results are already disastrous. The towns are being turned into unimpressive and unattractive hives of industry—built for the most part without any sense of architectural beauty and with the least possible regard for the preservation of the amenities of life. The landscapes are being vulgarized by the advertiser, and, in a lesser degree, by the Development Syndicate. The people, especially the women, are being subjected to the strain and stress of modern industrial competition, with but very few of the compensations or safeguards existent in western lands. There is more than a risk, owing to the demands on the worker, of his gradual brutalization."

Hobble Skirt "Provincial," Ugh!

Paris is not responsible for the horrid thing, anyway. America gets the blame. Paris calls it a "ridiculous and exotic style." Paris is horrified. Says the manager of the Maison Laferriere: "The hobble skirt cannot continue to exist. It is not worn among really smart women, only by those who wish to appear conspicuous in the street. It came to us originally from across the Atlantic."

The director of the Maison Rouff also declared in an interview that "American women tried to accustom Paris to this fantastic style of skirt which they liked, but they have not succeeded except very temporarily. Now it is considered distinctly provincial and common."

That settles it. Parisian women may not object to being "conspicuous in the street." Parisian women may not object to wearing a "fantastic style." But to be "provincial," never! The hobble skirt is doomed.

Italian King Condemns Dreadnoughts

A Neapolitan newspaper has published a short interview with the King of Italy which, it states, was obtained by an Englishman well known in public life. The authenticity of the interview it guarantees, although for obvious reasons it does not publish the Englishman's name.

"In five years' time," the King said, "a stage of perfection will have been reached in the science of flying which will show how short-sighted the policy is to go on multiplying these monster ships. They offer a splendid target to an enemy, and the loss of one of them with all on board would be an immense national disaster."

"During experiments recently carried out in America oranges thrown from an aeroplane traveling forty miles an hour struck the bridge of a warship at which they were aimed. Things like this should be ample warning that a $10,000,000 battleship may be crippled by an aeroplane costing $2,250. Moreover, since an aeroplane can carry two passengers, it would be easy to carry 170 pounds of some strong explosive in bombs, which could be scattered over an entire fleet."

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

OF ENGLISH REVIEWERS

A copy of the Literary Supplement of the London Times has come to the writer's desk. It brought great refreshment to the spirits. And it suggested a comparison with similar American reviews that is not flattering to our national pride. The nearest American parallel to this supplement is the similar supplement of the New York Times. And what a difference! The English reviews are written so obviously by men who know what they are writing about, by men with a comprehensive knowledge of literature as a whole, and, most striking of differences, by men who know how to write. Instead of the note of nervous haste that is so conspicuous in American writings, instead of the staccato phrases and the crisp, blunt words, we find here a calm and orderly progression from idea to idea, a rich and varied and supple vocabulary, the easy charm of the finished craftsman, the assured touch of the man who knows how.

As one reads these English reviews one learns anew what we Americans have almost forgotten, that our language contains words of more than two syllables which, when used by a skilled writer, add variety and grace and color to prose without the least appearance of affectation, without the slightest loss of simplicity and clarity. When one pauses to reflect upon current American writings, is it not remarkable how generally we have lost sight of the necessity for melody in the composition of prose, and how poorly we have utilized the resources of our generous and flexible language? Have we not done, even in our more cultivated writings, the thing we have protested we would never do, write down to the level of an assumed ignorant mob? It seems to the writer that the influence of the yellow journal has, in this regard, penetrated to the ranks of our best writers, making them loth to use the words which make possible the finer distinctions of meaning and the more delicate shadings of sound.

PART IN "PARSIFAL" FOR PATTI

Philip Hale, who writes the editorial paragraphs for the New Music Review, has been examining the story told by a Paris interviewer about Adelina Patti and Wagner, and by a careful comparison of dates has decided that there may be something in it. Patti was quoted as saying that Wagner told her he had her in mind for Kundry when he wrote "Parsifal." Wagner was working at "Parsifal" in the later '70s, when Patti was at her height as a singer, and according to the story, Wagner told Maurice Strakosch in London that he was at work on a new music drama in which there would be a stunning part for his sister-in-law, that is, Adelina, herself. Mr. Hale works it out as follows:

Of course, Maurice told this to Patti, who naturally thought of Kundry, and this idea was published in the papers, when the time came, as related by her to the interviewer. Equally, of course, the musical world guffawed at the idea. But, though Patti certainly played the buffoon to the world's "guffoon" in the business, has it ever occurred to you that Wagner (who never lacked cold cheek) may really have told Strakosch just what she reported him to have told, only that he was not thinking of Kundry at all as a part for Adelina, but of the First Flower Maiden? Wagner always knew a good thing when he struck it, and supposing Patti able to learn the part at all, she would surely have sung it at that time as no other woman in Europe could sing it. Naturally, it never occurred to Her Divine Majesty that Wagner could mean anything but the leading part for her!

The story is told that Judge Story and Edward Everett were once the prominent personages at a public dinner in Boston. The former, as a voluntary toast, gave: "Fame follows merit where Everett goes." The gentleman thus delicately complimented, at once arose, and replied with this equally felicitous impromptu: "To whatever height judicial learning may attain in this country, there will always be one Story higher."

MORE BIBLES THAN EVER

The British and Foreign Bible Society has just published its 106th annual report, showing that 6,620,024 Bibles, New Testaments, or portions of the New or Old Testament were distributed by the society during 1909. This is a record year, not only on the total, but on account of the 843,484 complete Bibles distributed, 493,000 of which are in the English language. The mission fields show a great advance in the number of Bibles taken, while the home fields and the continent show a perceptible falling off.

The Gospels have been published in six new languages during the past year. St. Matthew has been published in Ongom, the speech of a powerful Rantu tribe inhabiting the basin of the Gabun River in French Congo. St. Matthew and St. John have been published in Naman, the speech of 40,000 cannibals on the south coast of British New Guinea. For two tribes in New Caledonia St. Mark and St. John have been printed in Houallou, and St. Mark in Ponerihouen. For the Solomon Islands St. Matthew has been printed in Eiu, a dialect spoken on the Island of Mwala; while St. Luke has been issued in Raga, spoken on Whitsuntide Island, in the New Hebrides. All these six languages were reduced to written form in order that they might become vehicles of the Gospel. For the subjects of the Emperor Menelik a complete New Testament has at last been published in Tigrinya, a Semitic language spoken by 3,000,000 people in the Tigre Province of Abyssinia.

The marked increase in the issues during the past year is chiefly due to the advance of Christianity in the Far East. More than 1,500,000 copies of the Scriptures went out to China, and of these nearly 99 per cent were sold; while 356,000 books were circulated in Korea and 305,000 in Japan. In India, including Burma and Ceylon, the circulation rose to 780,000. In South America 155,000 copies, and in Canada 148,000 copies were put into the hands of the people, while 1,115,000 copies were distributed in Continental Europe.

BALLADE OF THE NATURAL HEART

By Lionel Josaphare

To me it seems a glory to excel

Where nature placed the honor long ago;

And I prefer the nut with hardest shell;

The bread I eat I ask be made of dough;

The purest white is all I ask of snow;

And diamonds I ask in all my rings.

All honor to the rivers when they flow!

I claim the real, old, rigid rule of things.

When all is duly done I feel quite well;

Therefore I like my wagon-wheels to go.

Lines may be straight and not be parallel;

I want my oars about me when I row;

Indeed, I yearn to pay the debts I owe;

And I respect the little bee that stings.

Aspiring not to say "Yes," meaning "No,"

I claim the real, old, rigid rule of things.

I wish to say "Ah" when a rose I smell;

And when I make my finger bleed, scream

"Oh!"

For what is pain without the right to yell?

Why have I tears if not to wet my woe?

I like all things to do the best they know;

If but a leech and faithfully it clings.

There's beauty in the peacock and the crow.

I claim the real, old, rigid rule of things.

ENVOY.

Prince, bring me not bouquets where flowers grow.

On beggars I want rags; crowns on my kings.

I love to see the peasant use his hoe.

I claim the real, old, rigid rule of things.

OPERA PREMIERES IN AMERICA

Operas which have attained international fame in the singing theatres of the world have not up to now received their first productions in America, says the New York Times. There have been some attempts to bring out operas by native or semi-native composers here. Walter Damrosch's opera "The Scarlet Letter" is an example of this sort of thing, and the most recent case which comes to notice is that of "The Pipe of Desire," which was brought forward at the Metropolitan Opera House last season. But an opera by an internationally famous and popular composer has yet to receive its first performance in this country.

The history of opera shows us, however, that by no means all the operas by Italian composers have been produced in Italy or by German composers in Germany. Gluck, for instance, wrote operas for Germany, for Italy, and last of all for Paris, where his "Iphigenie en Tauride" and "Armide" were brought out. Donizetti's "Fille du Regiment" was produced in Paris, and Verdi's "Aida" in Cairo.

These circumstances being well known, it seems strange that it has not occurred to the directors of the destinies of opera in America to order a few operas to be written for production here. If the idea was late in coming it has at last struck the town with force. During the coming winter New York is to have the privilege of witnessing the first production of three operas by three internationally famous operatic composers.

At the Metropolitan Opera House Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West" and Humperdinck's "Konigskinder" will be given for the first time anywhere under the direction of the composers, and Liebler & Co. will inaugurate the starring tour of Miss Bessie Abbott with the first production of Mascagni's as yet uncompleted "Ysobel."

The scores of the first two operas are completed and the dates for their production at the Metropolitan more or less definitely settled. "The Girl of the Golden West," for instance, has been announced for Dec. 6. And yet it is probable that the first of them to see the stage will be the new Mascagni opera, as the composer is now working on the scoring of the last act, and it is intended to have the opera ready for production at The New Theatre early in November.

When "Ysobel" is brought out, therefore, with the composer in the conductor's chair and Miss Abbott singing the part, New York will have an opportunity of witnessing a first night which will bring prominent people from all over Europe to America. The scene will be repeated later with the other two operas.

It must be remembered that Mascagni is the composer of "Cavalleria Rusticana," which belongs in the repertoire of every opera house in the world, and that Puccini is the composer of "Boheme" and "Madame Butterfly," which are equally popular.

HOW KANT WORKED

Kant, the great philosopher, cultivated peculiar habits which enabled him to accomplish a certain work in the world, says the London Globe. From the day he began to write until 60 years later we are assured that he kept the first two hours of the morning free from interruption, even eating his breakfast alone. No matter what the emergency, his family or servants dared not disturb him in these two hours of meditation. The rest of the morning until 1 o'clock was given to his work. At 2 o'clock he dined, always with invited guests, usually those interested in different pursuits from his own. Kant's effort was to rest and amuse his mind by contact with as many diverse intellects and characters as possible.

Kant entered the university of his native place when 16, but circumstances prevented him from taking his degree until 16 years later. So wedded was he to the scenes of his youth that it is said that he was never beyond a radius of 30 miles from the seat of learning to which he owed so much and which was so greatly indebted to him.

SAN FRANCISCO IN FESTAL ARRAY

NOTES OF COLOR AND CHARACTER IN ADMISSION DAY CARNIVAL

San Francisco is still. This is gala week. The crowds on Market street are thickening with the added thousands of visitors. There is a nervous speeding-up of activity. The pace of the passing throng is quickened. More automobiles are darting about the streets, moving more swiftly than their wont, sounding their horns more sharply and insistently.

Color has been added to the gray aspect of the streets. Festoons of green are looped from pole to pole along the sidewalks of Market street, and the poles themselves spray out into blossoms of palms. Strings of incandescent lights hang over the streets, shaded with rosettes of gold colored paper. Every building is decorated with bunting in green and gold. Gilded papier mache bears growl over many entrances. Across the front of the St. Francis hotel, two paintings are swung, one bearing the legend, "Welcome N. D. G. W." and the other, "Welcome N. S. G. W." It's a pretty warm welcome, for the first painting represents ambushed Indians welcoming a prairie schooner with a nice assortment of rifle shots, and the second represents Indian braves on horseback in their time-honored feat of "circling" a small group of pioneers brought to bay, one of the latter appearing in the act of dying with one arm carefully draped over the supporting knee of a comrade. At last the eye detects above each painting the magic letters, "1849," which throws the pictures back into historical perspective but hardly clarifies the symbolism. It may still be objected that the Native Sons depicted in the paintings are the Indians—but what's the use. Wait, though: we have settled the symbolism, we have decided just what to make of the pictures. There isn't any symbolism.

Thus relieved, we turn to the north face of Union Square. Here is an inspiring sight. Five thousand school children sit on bleachers in the benignant sun, a band plays softly, a solitary woman waves her arms, and five thousand childish voices rise in patriotic song. We confess unblushingly to a lump in the throat and tears in our eyes. We know not what brings them, but something is inexpressibly moving in the sight of these young faces, and thrilling in the treble note of their swelling song. They are practicing for the Admission Day Festival, where they will sing as they did for Portola last year.

But to get back to Market street. Here the newsboys are crying:
"Get that festival programme! Festival programme, here!"

Men are clambering reed-like ladders, putting up the last rolls of bunting and the last gilded bears. Merchants are finishing the dressing of their show windows, and putting in the cards announcing their most appealing bargains. In vacant doorways the itinerant fakir is erecting his stand, where he will sell anything that nobody wants the day after circus.

The crowd itself is full of interest. The country folk have come to town, father and mother and the kids, but it is not, as they say at Coney Island, to laugh. Father and mother are pretty pert, thank you, dressed about the same and as well as their city brethren and sisters, and looking prosperous and contented. Your Uncle Reuben with the foxtails and the billy-whiskers is conspicuously absent. They differ from the urbanites mainly in the fact that they are frankly enjoying themselves and don't care who knows it. The urbanites are walking a little more jauntily than usual and trying very hard to look sophisticated and superior, and showing that pretty plainly, too. Fortunately, however, one fails to observe here what is very common in New York, the being that someone has aptly dubbed "the city Rube." There is there a type of being as provincially urbanite as the traditional hayseed is provincially rural, and a much more offensive type he is, because he adds to conscious awkwardness a silly pride in his citified and benighted condition. In San Francisco one gathers that the city hasn't got too far away from the farm to be wholesomely affected by it, and that the farm has kept in close enough touch with the city to be alive to its advantages and to utilize them.

That lots of these people are from out of town is indicated by little things that strike the city eye as unusual. Family groups moving slowly up and down the streets at noon-time, obviously continuing to walk only because they have no place to go to sit down, is one sign. Other groups settling this problem by sitting on the stone steps of banking houses is another. The mere presence of large numbers of family groups is, in itself, another. And the number of people carrying parcels wrapped in paper that has plainly been wrinkled by repeated tyings and unttyings of the string, is another.

Of course the celebrations of the week are planned to amuse these visitors, and the amusements was planned to bring them here, and the bringing them here was planned to permit them to spend what they will in the shops of the town. It seems that the tradition of the shopkeepers runs back to prehistoric days, for have they not in all ages thus encouraged the thrifty agriculturist to "loosen up" on the store of wealth laid by at the harvest? Mayhap the agriculturist needs this gentle titillation of his purse nerves, at all events he rarely fails to get its subtle persuasion at the hands of the guileful tradesman. Pleasure for treasure is the bargain, and the county fair and Vanity Fair and the world's fair are parts of the age-old game.

The expectancy of waiting hopes is in the air. The shops show it in gorgeous and insinuating displays. The street fakir has scented it and has winged his way to the curbs to display his wares. A gleam of hope lightens the professional gloom on the face of the blind beggar on the corner and swells in the wheezy note of the ragged beggar woman in black as she turns the crank of her mournful hand organ. The bell-hop's feet from the Palace twinkle more spryly still as he shows a lady to the car, and his eye is brighter and his smile more shrewd as he bows to the proffered tip.

Now is a chance to catch certain popularities awing. Three styles of badges—where did the badge habit come from, by the way?—are the hope of the fakir's sales. The most popular is the Teddy—where have we heard that name before?—the Teddy bear, shrunk to the size of your thumb, and mounted for wearing in the coat lapel. The second is most improper, a tiny little china doll, clad like Eve before the fall, and bearing the burden of a song, "I love my wife, but, oh, you kid!" The third is a miniature reproduction of a glass of beer, with an illusion of the amber flood and the foaming collar, inscribed with the melodious and moving sentiment, "I feel so very dry." Wine and woman, and Teddy instead of the song.

Fiesta week comes opportunely. The Native Sons and the Native Daughters are coming into town. The order of Hoo-Hoos concatenate in the sounding aisles of the city instead of those where the dim woods ring. Barnum's circus, heralded by Tody Hamilton's aspiring alliterative adjectivity of phrase, comes with pomp and pageantry, cymbals and calliope, elephants and equilibrists. There will be no end of colors, crowds, music, money, fun and frolic, confetti and carefree gaiety. It may wind up with an empty purse and a buzzing head, but who cares now? San Francisco claims the palm of cities for mirth and for abandonment to the joyousness of the fiesta spirit. She held it ere the fire, she would claim it once again. In one bold week she would recoup her place and erase the hiatus in her long tradition of carnival.

This is the joyous side of the picture, and all this article pretends to show—the light and obvious, careless and superficial upper side of the show. Unquestionably it makes a pleasing appearance to the eye. To the student of economics it has another side, reflected in an editorial in the forepart of this paper. To the reveler, innocent or otherwise, it is a week to be memorable for many days.

SHEAR WIT

Falguiere, the sculptor, tells a capital story of Henner, the great artist, who, although he lived in Paris all his life, never lost his Alsatian peasant accent or his country manners. But Henner was a keen critic and had a clever way of showing his dislike of wordy enthusiasm. Falguiere, whose talent as a sculptor is known all the world over, was very fond of painting, but he did not paint particularly well. One day Henner was in his studio, and Falguiere showed him some of his pictures. "What do you think of this one?" asked Falguiere. "Suberp," said Henner, with his Alsatian accent. "Marfelous." "And this one?" "Broditchous!" "And this one?" "Suplime!" Then he picked up a little bust which his friend had just finished. "Ah!" he said. "Now, dat's good!" "I never painted after that," Falguiere used to say.—New Haven Palladium.

Here is a revision of the immortal tent-maker's work that a correspondent tenders us: A book of verses underneath the bough; A loaf of bread, a jug of wine, and thou—Beside me, sitting in the wilderness. The jug for mine, the book and bread for thou!—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Her husband was out walking with her for the first time since she had got her new hat satisfactorily trimmed. "Isn't it a perfect dream of a hat?" she remarked. "I said," she repeated, after some moments of silence, "isn't this a dream of a hat?" Still silence from the man. Then she ventured reproachfully. "Why don't you say something?" "My dear," he answered, "you seemed to enjoy your dream so that I was afraid of waking you."—Scraps.

"Now, dear," said a Yonkers mother, "when the cake is passed take a piece and say 'Thank you.' If it is passed again say, 'No, I thank you.' And should it be passed yet again say, 'Thank you, I don't care for any more.'" Unfortunately, it didn't stop there. The cake was passed yet again, and in relating her predicament the small maiden said: "I didn't know what to do, but then I happened to think of dear papa and I said, 'Excuse ME, but I told you no.'"—Yonkers Statesman.

Of late she has been saving her pennies to buy a birthday present for her father, and as the time draws near she has been much in doubt as to what she should get. Recently she was in a street car with her mother when an inspiration came. "I know what I'll buy father for his birthday," she said. All the passengers smiled at her eagerness and listened indulgently to hear what she might say. Looking at her mother she said, so audibly as to be embarrassing: "I'll buy him a bottle of beer."—Philadelphia Telegraph.

"One of my acquaintances is much interested in the Chagrin Falls Hunt club, and is an onlooker at most of the functions of that organization," says Ward Jackson. "The other night he said to me, with some show of enthusiasm, that gradually he was getting acquainted with the club members. 'Why, Dan Hanna came right up and spoke to me today,' he said exultantly. 'Is that so,' I replied. 'What did he say to you?' 'He said: 'Don't get too near that horse there or he'll kick your darn head off.'"—Cleveland Leader.

"Bill Sprague kept a general store at Croydon Four Corners. One day he set off for New York to buy a lot of goods. The goods were shipped immediately, and, as Bill had lingered in New York sightseeing, they reached Croydon Four Corners before him. The goods, in an enormous packing case, were driven to the general store by the local teamster. Mrs. Sprague came out to see what had arrived and with a shriek tottered and nearly fell. 'Oh, what's the matter, ma'am?' cried the hired girl. Mrs. Sprague, her eyes blinded with tears, pointed to the packing case, whereupon was stenciled in large, black letters, 'Bill inside!'"

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

The Maid of the Untamed Hair

A pitiful tale as ever was told,
Of a beauteous maid with dreamy eyes,
For her bonnet was made a bushel to hold,
While her head was only of two-quart size.
There was vacant space for a foot or two
Above and around and everywhere,
And, alas! there was nothing the maid could do
Excepting, of course, to fill it with hair.

Hair of Malay, Hindoo and Chink,
Hair Polynesian and Afric hair,
Hair the straightest and hair a-kink,
All on the head of the maiden fair!

And she sails the street with that mop of hair,
Straight or twisted, or frizzled at worst,
And I say as I gaze on the structure there:
"The Lord only knows who has worn it first";
And her bonnet looms like a mushroom top
Supported by stem that is slenderly fair,
And the men when they meet her quite frequently stop,
Appalled by the lady, and more by her hair.

And this is my girl, and this is your girl!
And to her our love we were ready to swear,
With her hair all straight or her hair a-curl.
The piteous maid of the untamed hair!

When the Telephone Goes Astray

The telephone undoubtedly is useful, but sometimes it fails in its divine mission to help mankind to hurry a little faster. It failed with me the other night, and this is how it did it:

Jones' wife gave birth to twins about a month ago, and I had intended to congratulate the couple as soon as I met either of them. Unfortunately, however, I met neither, and I felt that I should delay no longer; so I called their residence number on the 'phone.

"Give me blinky-blink double blink," I said to Central.

"Blinky-blink bl-z-z-z-z," said Central.

(You know how it is: Central always repeats your number, and not in one case out of six do you understand her, and then only by an oversight on her part, I am convinced.)

A feminine voice said, "Hello!" Evidently Mrs. Jones had responded.

"I trust that I do not call you from the nursery," I said, "at an inopportune time, but—"

"Sir-r!"

"Double blessings come so rarely in this world of adversity," I continued, "that since you have been favored with twins you must—"

"Sir-r-r! I presume that you are not aware that you are talking to Miss Angeline Borrowough-Trubble!"

I have never met Miss Borrowough-Trubble, and I trust that I never will, but my house vibrated for some time as a result of the force with which she hung up the receiver.

After I had somewhat recovered from the shock I told Central that she had given me the wrong number, and again called for blinky-blink double blink. A feminine voice responded to the call. This time I probably had Mrs. Jones, but I would make certain.

"Is this the Jones residence?" I inquired.

"It is."

"All right. I could safely go ahead.

"I have been so desirous," I said, "to see the dear little twins that were born to you that—"

"Te he he he! Te he he he he he—"

Very singular conduct on the part of Mrs. Jones, but I resolutely went ahead.

"That I could scarcely wait to see your charming little duplicate blessings and—"

"Te he he—I'm the—he he he—I'm the nurse—he he he he—"

I asked the nurse to present my felicitations to Mr. and Mrs. Jones, but never again will I attempt to congratulate anybody over a telephone. It is too uncertain.

The Opinions of Rufus

I don't know any harder test of the religion of some people than they would have if belongin' to a church was considered unfashionable.

When I c'nsider that woman was made out of man's rib I can't help feelin' it would have been a mighty good thing if more of him had been used es well.

I've never met a man that I b'lieved could have made the universe but I've met lots of 'em that was willin' to give the Almighty pointers on how it ought to have been done.

They say a feller feelin' makes us wondrous kind, but o' course it depends some on what the feller's feelin' fer.

Consid'rin' that solemnity an' wisdom ain't twins or even cousins, it's middlin' curious how often they're mistook fer each other in this world.

People are a good deal like the box of apples you bought: The best side of them is carefully placed where it will be the easiest seen.

My observashun of men leads me to more'n half b'lieve they's none that is reely good 'nough fer an everlastin' heaven an' none that ain't too good fer an eternal hell.

Even if Methuselah did live to be 'most a thousand years old, he didn't see nigh es much nor es interestin' es any man or woman livin' today hes seen.

They say that hell's paved with good intentions but if none of us' ever had any we wouldn't stand much show of reachin' the other place.

The big porker that had captured 'most all the trough said they was nothin' grieved his soul like the heartless selfishness of the insurgents in insistin' that he ought to stand over some an' give them a show.

Hope is never in vain, Hiram. Even if it dies, haven't you noticed that it gives you a heap of pleasure while it lasts?

The Reformed Fish in the Purified Pond

Once upon a time there was a certain fishpond which had become sadly unclean because of the filthy habits of some of the fish that swam about in its depths, and therefore did the better fish bemoan themselves and righteously vow that the pond should be purified.

To this end, accordingly, they straightway organized the Insurgent Piscatorial Association, and so righteously did they insure that ere long the pond was largely purified, and they were exceeding glad and rejoiced without ceasing.

"Behold!" they cried one unto another, "We have forever annihilated the boodle fish and the graft fish, the tenderloin fish and the higher-up fish! These are they which contaminated our pond, but now they are nit, and also they are aus gespiel!"

But, lo, even as they rejoiced, there were the boodle fish and the graft fish, the tenderloin fish and the higher-up fish, in their midst.

"What now?" they cried. "What do ye here? Avaunt, and also git, for your participation in our rejoicing is not seemly."

Then did the boodle fish and the graft fish, the tenderloin fish and the higher-up fish, explain with many explanations.

"Not so," they cried, "for, lo, we have been with you always in spirit and in sentiment. We have yearned as you have yearned and longed as you have longed, and our hearts' deepest emotions have stirred in response to your demand for better things and a cleaner pond. We did, indeed, conceal the fact, but this was only because our profoundest feelings forever are inexpressible."

Thereupon did the Insurgent Piscatorial Association slap them on the back as dearest friends, receive them into its membership and give them high and honorable offices.

And the last condition of that fishpond was worse than its first.

Moral—(If any man has not discovered the moral ere this, it would be useless to publish it for him. Others will not need it.)

Here's to the Race of Fools!

Here's to the race of fools! God wot
They're a cheery race to know,
For they smile no less though the sun shines not,
And they sing though the cold winds blow.
Well they know that the end is a six-foot home
With ne'er a partition or wall,
Yet they dance no less till the twilight gloam,
And never do falter at all.

So it's ho for the fools,
And it's hey for the fools,
And here's to the fools away!
For they bring delight
To the darkest night,
And, "It's all for the best," they say.

But the wise, the wise, the profoundly wise,
It were surely an absurd thing
If, knowing the riddle of earth and skies,
They ever should pause to sing;
So they say "ho hum," and they say, "hum ho,"
And, "We are the People," they say;
But the fools dance on till the sun sinks low,
With joy in their hearts away.

So here's to the fools,
To the race of fools,
With faith as a child's away!
Though they feel the rod,
Yet they trust in God,
And, "It's all for the best," they say.

Now Abideth the Politician

And now abideth faith, hope and the politician, but the most frequent of these is the politician.

He goeth forth in the morning and, lo, the voter drinketh right merrily at his expense.

And the voter's helpmeet, he greeteth her, and his kisses and microbes they are upon the lips of the little ones.

There is none whose saying he doth dispute; no, not one.

He proveth beyond peradventure that his opponent is a purloiner of sheep and abideth not in the ways of the just.

And the voters do beguile him, saying, "Inasmuch as a sparkle is upon the rye that the barkeep dispenseth, lo, it is recorded that we will vote for you."

Wherefore do they wink the eye right cheerily when he hath gone.

And, behold, he is with us always as election time draweth near.

And there is none who is registered that may escape him; no not one.

Wherefore, brethren, let us weep, for the day of the politician, who is eke a glad-hand artist, it is upon us, and we may not flee unto the mountains.

We Ought To Auto

We ought to feel that death is nigh
We ought to solemn be,
We ought to think our home's on high,
We ought to trouble see,
We ought to loathe this mundane sphere,
We ought to resigned feel,
We ought to do these things whene'er
We auto-mobile.

They Married for Love

"The marriage of the duke and Miss Richleigh was recognized as entirely one of love."
"Are you certain?"
"Oh, yes; he married her for love of money, and she married him for love of title."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Politics During the past week there has been politics to satiety. The atmosphere has been charged with it. There has been no escaping it without taking to the tall timber and whoever took to the tall timber to escape it deserved to be devoured by the timber wolves. Our civic duty bids us stand and take our medicine. The season opened at the Central theatre in San Francisco with a keynote speech by Theodore Bell. It has been watched for with much interest. There are many who were curious to know if the changed situation would be signalized by a changed note on the part of Bell, if his voice would be at all modulated to the sane and safe tone, the Republican boot being on the other leg this year. Besides, the Republicans and Democrats of our own state, talking both at once if not in unison, through their respective state conventions, Wisconsin and Michigan, New Hampshire and Vermont, have claimed their meed of attention, to say nothing of the President and Colonel Roosevelt at the Conservation Congress and the tribulation of Ballinger. There has been much doing and mainly of a most satisfactory character.

Ding-Dong Theo. Bell The keynote address of Theodore Bell on Saturday evening last was an eminently satisfactory event. In many respects it was a brilliant effort. When Bell referred to those of us who have been over-much anxious to see how he would stand the test of altered conditions he declared, with a fine tartness we must allow, "You need not bother me with ordeals, tests or trials, but save them for yourselves. I have gone through them all when many of you were not beside me with your counsel, but before me with your swords. I have withstood those tests and trials and have come out unscathed and self respecting and I pray that in the midst of all your paper talk about mutilating your party together for another partisan battle you may emerge as clean and undefiled. If you must deny to me the simple tribute of having steadfastly kept the faith, please refrain from subtle intimations that I may be turned aside by votes and influences that you, yourselves, will make a desperate effort to retain, and with harmonious jubilation accept with open arms if they come within your reach." Very finely, effectively and even brilliantly said! The Watchman is disposed to take Theodore Bell at his word, to value him at par, and to rejoice in what he regards as the best possible condition for a redeemed California, a condition in which both parties and candidates are determined to be free. Time was, and not so very long ago, when both of them were willing enough to eat out of the Herrin hand and thought it no degradation. That was the worst condition possible. Heaven grant that it come not again. California can not endure half slave and half free, with one party chained to the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau and the other fighting energized and concentrated millions. It is glorious for both parties to breathe the air of freedom.

The Clarion Call Of Hiram Johnson But if Theodore Bell imagined that Hiram Johnson would sing low, now that he wants the regular votes of regular Republicans, he also underestimated the steadfastness of his opponent. In his address at the close of the Republican state convention Tuesday evening Hiram Johnson made it as clear as language could that, while he had no purpose to reopen the wounds inflicted during the campaign, nevertheless, as to the main issue upon which he had made it, the issue of a free state and the elimination of the Southern Pacific Company and William F. Herrin from control of the Republican party in this state, he would stand for no wavering, no concessions, no apologies, no compromise, no bargaining, compounding or yielding one iota from the stand he had taken. He would fight it out on that line to the end be the consequences what they may and, furthermore, he believed in carrying the war into every other commonwealth in the United States until there should come to be no foot of territory in the Union not in the political possession of free men. The language here used is not that of Mr. Johnson, nor so good, but it fairly epitomizes what he drove home again and again until the dullest comprehension could be in no doubt that, as to Herrinism and all it stands for, the black flag still waves. How splendid it all was and how splendidly did the convention rise to it! Some of us who have fought years and years, within the party, to see such a day, have experienced no such ecstasy of civic joy since the surrender of Lee and the fall of the Confederacy. It was glorious!

What Both Parties Have Declared For It will be borne in mind that, while the Republican state convention was sitting in San Francisco, the Democrats had tempted providence by assembling at Stockton, where the echoes of the Stockton convention of years ago still reverberate, severally deliberating on how to save the state. As all the delegates live in the same state and at the same time it is not surprising that both conventions thought much alike on many things. Briefly and substantially the two conventions were in agreement along the following lines:

The elimination of Southern Pacific influence in the politics of the state.

The elimination of partisan politics from public institutions and administrative affairs.

Economy and efficiency in state government.

The non-partisan nomination and election of the judiciary.

Removal of the party circle and restoration of the Australian ballot.

Asiatic exclusion.

Reformatory for first offenders.

Reformation of criminal procedures.

Simplification of the Direct Primary Law.

Direct vote for the election of United States Senators.

Initiative, referendum and recall.

Railroad regulation and physical valuation of railroad properties.

The establishment by the national government of a Panama-Pacific steamship line similar to the one plying on the Atlantic side.

Conservation of resources within the state by the state, and nationally as well.

Improvement of roads and harbors.

With reference to these important issues the two parties travel roads essentially parallel and there is nothing to quarrel about as to them.

Republican Policies Not Also Democratic With reference to the tariff both conventions voiced their dissatisfaction with the present law and present methods of making a tariff, but the Republicans declared for the protection idea measured by the difference in labor cost at home and abroad. The Democrats dodged that very important issue. The Republicans declared for a non-partisan tariff commission. The Democrats were mum again. They distinctly fell down on that very important issue.

While both stood for the election of a United States senator by direct vote the Republicans demanded a state-wide free expression of advisory, primary opinion until such time as the constitution should be so amended as to elect by direct vote. The Democrats probably overlooked that. There is no good reason why they should not be for it.

The Republicans called upon our representatives in congress to join the forces of progress, the Democrats did not, but then they haven't anybody in congress.

The Republicans favored the short ballot, meaning such a reduction in the number of offices to be filled by election as will simplify elections. The Democrats forgot or dodged.

The Republicans declared in favor of home rule for counties instead of the abominable system of fixing up county government bills at the instance of senator and assemblyman without the people at home having anything to say about it. It is constructive legislation of a high order. The Democrats overlooked it, not being very constructive anyhow.

The Republicans declared for an employers' liability act that will make the industry itself, and not the employer or employee, carry the cost of crippling workmen. That the Democrats failed to do this is surprising. At best they are belated.

The Republicans favored limiting and regulating the use of injunction in state as well as in national affairs. The Democrats were caught napping again.

The Republicans declared in favor of allowing the manhood of California again to vote on the issue of woman suffrage by the submission of a constitutional amendment. The Democrats did not have the requisite courage to face that issue.

The Republicans approved the Panama-Pacific exposition. The Democrats made a noise that sounded like keeping mum on that issue so far as platform is concerned.

The Republicans declared for the Democratic idea of a national income tax and the ratification of the amendment therefor. The Democrats forgot it, strange to say.

The Republican convention resolved in favor of a rigid enforcement of all anti-trust laws. The right hand of the Democrats forgot its cunning that time, too. They should have been able to pump some thunder on that.

It will be noted that the things the Republicans stand for that the Democrats do not are mainly constructive.

Democratic Policies Not Also Republican The Democrats also got a few things in their platform that the Republicans did not think of, but they are mainly perfunctory things that are to be taken as matter of course and are about as significant as copying in the Ten Commandments would have been. They are:

"Equal protection and enforcement of the laws." Certainly.

"Retrenchment and reform in public expenditures." Of course.

"Eight-hour law particularly specified." The Republicans endorsed unionism, which amounts to much the same thing.

"Improvement of the public school system." Nobody will object, not even old bachelors or Indians not taxed.

"Fostering of agriculture, etc., etc.," squinting at, but not daring to say, district fairs. No chance for a fight on that.

"The encouragement of manufacturing and home industry." How not suggested. Very empty. As illuminating as a candle that has gone out.

"Reform of the fish and game laws and regulations." This is encroaching on the private preserves of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. Wonder how the Republicans forgot it! It is full of Herrin's handy men. However, Republican senators did not overlook their chance when the confirmation of W. G. Henshaw for member of the Game and Fish Commission came up. Honors are even.

"Preventing alien ownership of lands." There is some difference of opinion on this issue, but not along party lines.

Where the Issue Is Likely To Lie The Republican and Democratic candidates and platforms stand, on the paramount issue of making California a free commonwealth, precisely alike and, The Watchman is disposed to concede, with equal sincerity of purpose. The Republican platform is characteristically progressive. It lays hold on what it touches with a firm grasp. The Democratic platform is characteristically timid. It failed to take hold as though it meant to do something as well as to be something. If there is anything in the Democratic platform that suggests concession to the safe and sane element it is this lack of robustness.

The campaign is likely mainly to pivot on the personalities of Johnson and Bell, both in their prime, both morally and intellectually clean but, as The Watchman sees them, differing markedly in both fibre and size. It is no disrespect to Mr. Bell to say of Mr. Johnson that he, Johnson, was cast in a much larger mold, made of tougher fibre, endowed with more splendid mental capacities and a more resolute and inflexible will.

Mr. Bell has made his own political advancement the study of his life, honorably and even patriotically, as becomes ingenuous American manhood. It is not ignoble to aspire to a public life. Mr. Bell has joined everything that came along, cultivated acquaintance and planned for years to reach the end he now aspires to reach.

On the other hand, Mr. Johnson has given himself to the practice of his profession, not failing to discharge the duties of citizenship or, upon occasion, to throw himself into contests without thought of self, waging "bully fights" for Right Things because they were right and because it was right that he should. At this juncture Mr. Bell desperately wants to be governor. Mr. Johnson desperately wants to see the fight he has spent half a year in making completely triumphant. That's the difference.

Transcendent Reason Why Finally, a transcendent reason why the Republican party should triumph in the forthcoming election is that defeat would be accepted as a repudiation by the party of all that this newer and freer Republicanism stands for. Just think what it would mean to the most important movement of our time if La Follette and Beveridge, Norris and Murdock, should be defeated for election in their own states! Think what it would mean if the victory won at the primaries by the Progressive wing of the Republican party in New Hampshire and Michigan should result in Democratic and not Republican success! It would be a national calamity. And there is no state in the Union, unless we except New York, in which the triumph of a progressive Republicanism would mean so much to the nation as in California. Here is the Democrat's great temptation. Here is the reason why a patriotism on the part of Mr. Bell that would be absolutely forgetful of self and of party, would prompt him to make the election of Johnson unanimous. Here is the reason why every Democrat who registered as a Republican to help nominate Johnson should vote for Johnson to help elect him. Satan has gone to the mountains to view the situation at large, and he hasn't gone alone.

Spalding And Works There is a deal of idle talk in the newspapers as to the result of the advisory vote for United States senator, much of it with the evident purpose of booming Spalding through whether or no. The truth is just this: Judge Works received the larger number of votes in the state but, under the fearful and wonderful advisory provision of the primary law, even a majority vote throughout the state does not count. Mr. Spalding has received a plurality vote in the larger number of districts throughout the state, at least presumptively, if the Democratic districts be included. But the law specifically reads thus: "Members of the legislature shall be at liberty to vote either for the choice of their respective districts expressed at such primary election, or for the candidate who shall have received the endorsement of their party in the greatest number of districts electing members of such party to the legislature." This eliminates from the Spalding vote all Democratic districts carried by him and leaves Judge Works with a state-wide plurality, which has a moral sanction, and a plurality of Republican legislative districts, so far as it can now be foreknown how the elections will turn out in November. Nothing can be certain until after the November election shall have been held, but the preponderance is positively on the side of the candidacy of Judge Works. As for the rest, wait and see.

The Watchman's Convention Notes

The Watchman has attended, first and last, a good many Republican state conventions. This was different. It was tanned. It was largely made up of men who are out in the sun working for a living. There was an absence of rotundity of figure, of that peachblow complexion, faultless attire and shaved neck which so becomes the barkeep and the political odd-jobs man who helps the barkeep hold up the bar from the other side. This convention was made up of those who work. There was no flabbiness in it. Many visages were deeply chiselled. The delegates were mature men.

The old guard was absent, conspicuously so. Many "organization" delegates did not attend. The few that were there joined in the cheering sparingly. It was their funeral and they behaved as well regulated corpses should in such cases. They just lay low and, with the exception of John McNab, sang low.

The speech made by Chester H. Rowell in taking over the gavel from the "organization" chairman of the state central committee was a fine effort. It will read even better than it sounded. It was in good temper, but straight from the shoulder and thoroughly intelligible.

The address made later by A. J. Wallace, candidate for Lieutenant-Governor, was also admirable. To many of the delegates Mr.

The Watchman has attended, first and last, a good many Republican state conventions.

WHAT HE IS NOT DOING

Wallace had been merely a name." After they heard him he became a fixed quantity in public affairs. He had measured up far beyond their expectations.

There was not a false note in the whole proceedings. Not a word of buncombe was spoken or read or adopted into the platform. There was a sincerity and frankness that was refreshing and that made it good to be there.

It goes without saying that the address of Hiram Johnson at the close was full of fire and high resolve. That was expected of him and he made good, absolutely good.

The platform committee made one mistake. It endorsed the good roads bond proposition, at least inferentially. The state is not ready for that yet and will not be until it has placed its engineering forces in better shape to grapple with it. It was a scheme to spend public money to political advantage, crude and undeveloped. It can wait. It should be voted down and not up. That was the only false step from start to finish.

The McNab Incident

The McNab incident was in some respects unfortunate. The convention had adopted the customary rule that all resolutions go to the resolutions committee without debate. Mr. McNab failed to send his resolution to the committee at all but sought to bring it before the convention after the platform had been reported. There he was tactically at fault. Had he taken his resolution to the committee, and the committee had rejected it, he would have had a right to appeal from its decision. However, The Watchman felt, and still feels, that the convention could have afforded to be more generous. Very likely it would have been had it not been that Mr. McNab's manner and method indicated a purpose to obtain by indirection that which he might not obtain directly. He should have moved to amend the section endorsing the President by substituting his own and, after the question had been put, then debating it. It has seldom happened that a platform has been amended after it left the hands of the committee on platform, but there should be freedom to amend and to debate amendments. A progressive Republicanism may well stand for freer methods in that regard. However, the platform correctly voiced progressive Republican sentiment regarding the President. He is not entitled to more until he does more.

The Watchman supposed, when Mr. McNab took the platform, that he was going to offer a resolution commending the Gillett administration. That would have precipitated a merry war, not that the convention has anything against Gillett except that he owes his political existence to a political system that has been overthrown, and he has not been disobedient to that system. To have endorsed him would have been stultifying. The best thing that could be done was done. The face was turned the other way in silence and the state moved forward to higher ground, with "charity for all and malice toward none." Let us hope that James N. Gillett will be the last of the corporation line.

Many "organization" men will feel as George Knight, always an "organization" man, is reported to have expressed himself as feeling, glad that the old order has changed. It was dominated, as he declared, by essentially small men. It was. No big man will take orders from a boss. That shut the big men out and left Herrin naught but intellectual and moral mediocrity with which to run a government. It is a wonder that he did as well as he did.

Great News From the East

Joy is experienced in all progressive hearts, whether Republican or Democratic, over the victory which La Follette has won in Wisconsin. It was a hard fight, because all the powers of privilege were against him. The interests felt that if La Follette could be downed in his own state, and by the people at large, it would deal insurgency a staggering blow. But that blow did not arrive. It hit the air. La Follette won in a great dash to look back chagrined to find that his competitors had been distanced at the quarter pole. Great news!

And Michigan! Julius Caesar Burrows, who "got things" for his state by eating out of the hand of Aldrich, is rubbing his eyes in a vain effort to understand how the Michiganders could be so ungrateful.

And that dear old granite state! For a generation a political dependency of the Boston & Maine as California has been of the Southern Pacific, well, it went insurgent, too, and there will be some more congressional candidates declaring that as for Cannon, he is not for them.

In Vermont the insurgents had not done much and the "organization" conducted the campaign with a dearly bought and scanty victory over the Democrats and free Republicans. The campaign had the moral value of a victory for Right Things if no other.

"God reigns and all is well in his world."

A Snapshot of The Convention

A visitor to the Republican state conventioned likened it to a family reunion. He noted that good-natured jubilation was the key of the temper of the delegates. There was no rancor, no bitterness. The only references to the late campaign were made in friendly banter. None the less the delegates were profoundly in earnest. Noteworthy was the high class of men, many of whom were present at a state convention for the first time.

ANALYSIS OF AMENDMENT NO. ONE

By CARL C. PLEHN

(Prof. Plehn, by far the best authority on the subject in the state, has kindly consented to prepare a series of short articles on Amendment Number One for The California Weekly. These articles will meet a want on the part of those who seek information, and also promote discussion upon those features in regard to which two opinions may be held. Questions asked through these columns will, we are quite certain, be readily answered by Prof. Plehn. The staff of The California Weekly is not thoroughly convinced that the amendment is yet in the form it should take before being adopted by the people and, for that reason, welcomes brief discussion of the subject, point by point. Make the articles short.)

As the preamble states, the amendment opens the way to the separation of state from local taxation. To this end it adds a new section to article XIII of the constitution, which article is the one dealing with revenue and taxation. It leaves the old sections unchanged, except in so far as they are modified by the provisions of the new section. Section 10 of article XI, a section in the article relating to counties, cities and towns, is repealed because it prohibits separation.

The amendment provides that certain taxes on the property of certain classes of companies, as named and described below, shall be exclusively for state purposes. It leaves the old system of ad valorem taxation on property in general other than that of the classes named, for the use of the counties, cities, school and other districts. The term companies is defined to include persons, partnerships, joint stock associations, companies and corporations.

The taxes reserved for the state are:

(1) On the operative property of railroad companies, including street railways, at the rate of four per cent of their gross receipts annually.

(2) On the property of sleeping car, refrigerator car and all other car companies at the rate of three per cent of their gross receipts annually.

(3) On the property of express companies at the rate of two per cent of their gross receipts, annually.

(4) On the property of telegraph and telephone companies at the rate of three and one-half per cent of their gross receipts annually.

(5) On the operative property of all light, heat and power companies at the rate of four per cent of their gross receipts annually.

All the non-operative property of the above corporations is left subject to local taxation.

Street car companies must pay, as now, the two per cent of their gross receipts to the cities under the Broughton Act, for the enjoyment of their franchises in the public streets and this is in addition to the four per cent paid to the state.

(6) Insurance companies are to pay one and one-half per cent of their gross premiums. The real estate of insurance companies is to be taxed locally as now.

(7) Banks are to pay six-tenths of one per cent on their capital stock, surplus and undivided profits, but there is to be deducted from the capital stock the assessed value of their real estate, which will be taxed locally as now.

(8) All franchises other than those included in the property taxed as above are to be valued and taxed at the rate of one per cent ad valorem.

The rates of taxation set down in the amendment can be changed only by a three-fourths vote of the legislature.

The gross receipts upon which the taxes are to be computed are defined in accordance with the law that has been in force in Minnesota for over half a century and which is supported by numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the state courts.

The State Board of Equalization is made the board of assessment for banks. But it is left to the legislature to determine who shall administer the other taxes.

The amendment makes it obligatory on the legislature to continue the present contributions from the state funds for the common schools and other educational purposes. It provides that the property of the classes mentioned shall be subject as heretofore to taxation to meet the interest and principal of outstanding bonded indebtedness of the cities, counties, school districts, etc., where such property is located.

It provides further that in case the state revenues from the taxes named are not sufficient

A RENEWED CHARTER FOR A RENEWED CITY

THE PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO SAN FRANCISCO'S CHARTER

By HARRIS WEINSTOCK

There are, so to speak, new styles in city charters as well as in spring bonnets. "The world do move" and so we find that municipal ideas which seemed perfectly to fit the conditions of today, are tomorrow found to be a misfit.

Every once in a while a new municipal wave sweeps over the country and leads scores upon scores of cities to change the fundamental laws of their local government.

This is not to be deplored but is rather to be regarded as an evidence of progress. The American, unlike most orientals, has little reverence for laws which have nothing to commend them other than their age or mere traditions.

What has put the American manufacturer in the world's industrial forefront has been the courage he has displayed in today casting upon the scrap pile costly machinery that but yesterday, so to speak, was looked upon as the best in the world, but which had to make way for something still more perfect.

What will ultimately put our American cities in the world's forefront for good municipal government is this same spirit of irreverence for laws that but yesterday were looked upon as ideal, but which must make way for other laws regarded today as still more ideal.

One-Man Government in Cities

It was not much more than a decade or so ago when a municipal epidemic broke forth and cities north and south, east and west, were changing their city charters with the view of centralizing power in the mayor, thus largely establishing the one man power system. This was done on the theory that the one man power system located responsibility and when things went wrong enabled the people to put their finger on the sore spot.

For a time, the system worked fairly well in some cities. The uncommon power that this system gave the mayor for good or for ill, was a great incentive for the unholy among the voters to make heroic efforts to get their man in the mayor's chair so that through him they could run and own things.

San Francisco was among the cities that adopted the one man power plan of government. The people found, however, that when, for example, they got a Eugene Schmitz in the mayor's chair they were very much in the position of the man who lies helpless before his enemy. The people discovered that the one man power system was a system full of dire consequences to themselves should they be so unfortunate as to select an unfit man for the mayor's post. Other cities found out the same thing and the one man power idea soon found itself on the wane.

The Commission Plan

As an improvement on this system the so-called commission plan of municipal government was brought into life. This system in turn, at least among the moderate sized cities in the country, has swept over the nation and bids fair to become the prevailing system until a plan deemed still better presents itself. Under the commission form of government, the affairs of a municipality are placed in the hands, usually, of five men, each in charge of some important municipal department. Collectively they act as the municipal legislative body and separately, as, more or less, independent executives.

At the recent San Francisco city charter convention, the question of adopting the commission plan of government for this city was discussed at great length. The consensus of opinion reached, however, among the delegates, was that the system is still in too much of an experimental stage to be recommended, since as yet it has not been attempted by any city in America containing more than a fraction of San Francisco's population. Some day, perhaps in the not far distant future, the question will again be brought up in our midst with different results.

San Francisco Charter Outgrown

The recent city charter convention found that in the brief period of a decade the city had outgrown its municipal laws. The time at command was insufficient to re-make the charter as a whole. It was, therefore, deemed expedient to deal only with the more salient points needing attention, with the view, immediately after the coming fall election, of reconvening the convention and utilizing the next two years for the preparation of a complete new instrument.

Of the nine proposed amendments prepared by the charter convention, I shall, in this response to the invitation of The California Weekly to prepare an article for publication in its columns on charter amendments, confine myself to the three or four proposed amendments which to my mind are the most important and which if approved by the people at the polls will largely, in my opinion, change for the better our form of local government.

Requiring Majority Rule

The most important of these several prospective amendments is the one providing for a majority rule. One of the fundamental principles upon which American government is based is that of the rule of the majority; and yet, this city, in common with many other American cities, has frequently found itself ruled by officials representing a minority of the voters. There is always danger of this where the three party system prevails, thus defeating one of the fundamental principles of a true democracy. To overcome this weak spot in our political system, an amendment is to be submitted, not unlike that which has recently become known as the Berkeley system, now in operation in our neighboring city of that name. Under the proposed change there is no limit placed upon the number of candidates who may submit their names to the voters at the primary election. Out of a possible multitude of candidates for any one office to be voted upon at a primary election, should any one candidate receive a majority of all the votes cast, he would be declared elected. Should no candidate receive a majority of votes cast, then all but the two candidates receiving the highest number of ballots are dropped and the voters are called upon at the regular election which shortly follows, to choose between the two, thus insuring a majority election.

Direct Nominations Simplified

Another important proposed amendment is the one providing for direct nomination in the simplest possible form. At present a citizen wishing to become a candidate for public office must go to the seemingly needless trouble and expense of circulating petitions and getting a large number of signers. This costs him a considerable sum, is an interminable nuisance to voters, who are pestered from all sides to sign an endless number of petitions for the usual large number of candidates for public office and adds nothing to the possibility of securing good government. Under the proposed amendment any citizen can become a candidate for any municipal public office who can bring to the public registrar not less than ten nor more than twenty sponsors who under oath will vouch for his fitness. There is little danger of more candidates submitting themselves to the voters under the proposed than under the present system, since few men care to offer themselves as candidates for public office unless they feel assured of a reasonable number of votes. The ridicule and humiliation following a pitifully small vote are powerful restraining influences even with the vainest.

Initiative, Referendum and Recall

The next important amendment deals with the initiative, the referendum and the recall. The only provision for the referendum in the present charter is the one which provides that ordinances involving or granting any city franchise for the supply of light or water, or for lease or sale of any public utility or for the purchase of land of more than fifty thousand dollars in value must be submitted for approval to the vote of the electors.

We have recently heard much of the likelihood of the present Board of Supervisors rescinding the act of the previous board which drove out the slot machines, and bringing back into life this modern evil.

The Board of Supervisors under the present charter have the power to do this pernicious thing. They have the power to re-establish a condition which in the interest of the few, means the moral degradation of the many. Means not only robbing the wives and the children of many small salaried men as well as the wives and children of wage earners of the ordinary comforts of life, in order that the insatiable appetite of the slot machine may be appeased, but it also means arousing the gambling habit in the youth of our city with all its dreadful and almost inevitable baneful consequences to the victims of the vice. Under our present city charter the Board of Supervisors, despite the protest of the people, have the power to do this and for the time being the voters would be helpless. Under the proposed change in the referendum, a petition containing the names of five per cent of the voters would compel the Board of Supervisors to submit such ordinance to the vote of the people at the next election, who could repeal it. A petition containing seven per cent of the names of the voters would suspend the measure until the people had voted upon it.

Smaller Percentage For Initiative

In the matter of the initiative, that is, permitting the voter to initiate legislation, the present charter calls for petitions containing 15 per cent of the names of the voters before a proposed measure can be submitted to the people. This percentage was deemed needlessly large and tending to hamper initiative legislation. The proposed charter amendment provides that four per cent of the voters shall have the right to initiate legislation and that when ten per cent of the voters sign the petition a special election must be called.

The recall has in various cities been found an excellent remedy for cases where the people had unknowingly elected to public office unfit or incompetent men. Our present charter has within it a recall provision, but it is made almost prohibitory because it requires the recall petition to contain the names of thirty per cent of the voters. Since only about sixty per cent of the registered voters cast their ballots at the average election, this means getting the names of about half the actual voting population. Under most circumstances this is almost impossible. Many voters dissatisfied with the conduct of the official about to be recalled and who at the election would vote against his retention, hesitate to sign the recall petition through fear that if it should fail, they might find themselves treated as a target at the hands of the offended official. The proposed amendment reduces the number of signers required to a recall petition to ten per cent or a minimum of 7000 votes.

If nothing more should be achieved at the coming charter amendment election than the adoption of the several foregoing amendments a great step will have been taken locally in the direction of good government and an important stride will have been made toward putting San Francisco among the cities of the country that are making the speediest progress toward clean, decent, honest municipal rule.

("Amendment No. One"—Concluded)

ent to meet the state's needs there may be a state ad valorem tax on all property, including property of the classes named.

To tide over the period of change and readjustment two counties, San Bernardino and Placer, are, until the year 1918, to be reimbursed by the state for what they lose in railroad taxes, and any districts which may suffer by the sudden change are to be aided from the county general funds.

The legislature is required to pass the laws necessary to carry the new system into effect.

In explanation of the above rates it may be stated that they are fixed on the theory that these proportions of the gross receipts will in each case equal the average burden of taxation on other classes of property.

The attempt has been made by the legislature, in re-submitting this matter to the voters, to meet the principal objections which were urged against the reform amendment. One of these was that in case the revenues set apart for the support of the state shall prove insufficient the corporations of the above classes would not be taxed to make up the deficiency but that tax would fall only upon other classes. The new amendment provides that all shall bear this alike.

Another objection was that it was not clear whether the property of the corporations would continue to be subject to local taxation for the payment of interest and principal of bonded indebtedness incurred prior to the adoption of the new system. This has now been made clear.

Another objection was that if it should appear in the future that the rates of taxation levied upon the corporations were insufficient they could be changed only by a constitutional amendment. Under the new amendment they may be changed by the legislature but only by a three-fourths vote which is designed to prevent hasty and ill-considered reductions or increases.

WHAT LINCOLN STEFFENS THINKS OF THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

The staff of The California Weekly was made almost proud on the reception of the following letter from Lincoln Steffens, and for the reason that there are few men in America in a better position to know of the things of which he writes. His good opinion is an asset.

But he has rather better expressed the purpose of The California Weekly than its own staff has been able to. The state is entitled to have a soul, not two but one, large-minded and generous, and if The California Weekly shall be helpful in the discovery and development of such a "Soul of California" it will abundantly justify its existence.

Editor California Weekly:

We hear it said that there are too many magazines, weeklies and other publications in this country. I think there are not enough. I think there are not enough magazines to represent half the thought, facts and feelings of the American people. And I think that besides the more magazines needed, we should have also more local or territorial monthlies like the Pacific Monthly, the Sunset, the New England Magazine, etc.

And so in the weekly field we should have not only national weeklies, like Colliers, for example, but local or provincial weeklies, like the Mirror in Missouri and The California Weekly. And these are needed not alone for their local service to the people in their province but to those of us also who want to know what parts of the people are thinking, feeling, and doing. The California Weekly I find to be indispensable if I am to keep track of California. You do that well. I could wish that you would lead your people a little faster; I think they would follow a little faster if their leaders would but dare to lead, but I think you do reflect the progressive movement in the state, and are serving a function there which your readers, probably, do not all appreciate. You are developing a community sense, a consciousness of the state of California as a whole. And the people of the state need you more than they know. For there really is no such thing yet as "The People of California." They don't think together, nor do they feel as an entity. (I say this in spite of the returns of your primary election.) If you go on giving expression to the common thought and feeling of the whole people, you will produce a very beautiful thing: the soul of a state.

And you are fit to do that, because you have at least one quality that is inherent in our state: a sense of the beautiful. The California Weekly is one of the best written publications in the country. And this is not my judgment alone. It is the judgment of all the editors East here who have tried to get members of your staff to write for them.

I sincerely hope you will have no trouble in tiding over the period that it takes all young publications to become known to the readers who would like to read them if they knew about them.

Yours sincerely,

LINCOLN STEFFENS.

JED'S father had, in his younger days, learned the printer's trade. There was no paper at the county seat. "The Ajax" had perished of inanition. When there was a paper there the people did not care to have any, but when there wasn't any they wanted one real bad, and Jed's father was induced to revive "The Ajax." York was the farthest town of any size, short of the mountains, out on the frontier, and it was not of any size to speak of, either. It may have contained seven hundred or eight hundred inhabitants about equally divided between those who hungered after righteousness for others to practice and those who thirsted after whisky that they wanted for themselves and their friends. The first half served God with more zeal than discretion and the last half served Satan with an indefatigable sagacity that was worthy of a better cause.

The town see-sawed between no license and low license, saloons wide open and saloons closed so tightly that no one could get into them without a password, signs, grips and private keys to private lockers. There were more of both churches and saloons than could decently be maintained and, with strained relations between these two warring factions, Jed's father soon found that a paper published by a liberal thinker who would not allow a liquor advertisement in his paper, and persistently demanded the enforcement of the law, was thin ham in a stale sandwich. But that is another story, a story of deprivation and heroism, of fidelity to principle at the cost of health and of life, as brave a battle as was ever lost and won since seed corn was first put into the ground to die that it might live more abundantly.

Such was York at the junction of the Indigo and the Sandy when Jed, a little more than nine years of age, came to it with his father's family to hazard new misfortunes. He carried his sick arm in a sling, for he had only just recovered from the fever that had caused it to be sick, and he walked pigeon toed, a result of having burned his feet when he was a baby.

The live stock, with the exception of a cow and a pony, had been exchanged for a home for the family. It seemed palatial. There was a room below with a chamber above reached by real stairs instead of by a ladder. Jed ran up and down those stairs fifty times the first day in honor of the man who invented stairs to take the place of ladders. A little one-story cottonwood cabin had been moved onto the place and set at right angles to the wing first mentioned, after which the two were connected with a lean-to and another lean-to hung precariously to the cabin. Here indeed was a mansion! To be sure the parlor had to have a bed in it and the dining room was kitchen, too. The little sisters slept in the lean-to and Jed shared the chamber up those wonderful stairs with the trunks and trumpery that naturally had to go somewhere. It was a perfectly splendid home, the very best Jed had ever seen the inside of. To be sure the roofs leaked some when it rained hard and pans had to be set under the leaks to catch the dripping water; the snow sifted through the shingles in winter when the wind blew hard, but it was even so in the cabin down on the Serpentine. When it was very cold out of doors it was very cold indoors, but whoever heard of it being otherwise anywhere! Certainly not Jed.

No sooner were the household effects gotten inside, and the mansion explored than Jed watched his chance to slip off up town and see the sights. The printing office was to be in the second story of the only three-story building in five counties and Sailor John was bossing a crowd of volunteers who, with block and tackle and a tangle of ropes, were getting the Washington hand press and the imposing stones up and in through the front windows, the outside stairway being too weak to bear the weight of the machinery and the men to carry it.

How Sailor John did swear! It made Jed's liver turn white and his blood run cold. Jed had heard very few swear words in his nine years of life, for his own father never used so much as one in all his life; but he knew what they were and how intolerably wicked. Once he had used them himself with consequences, as he then believed, nearly fatal. Old Kate had jumped across certain gullies that the rains had made in an old road, nearly throwing Jed out of the saddle, whereat Jed swore at her the biggest roundest oaths he knew, and then trotted straight home through fear that Satan would waylay him on the way if he did not hurry. That night he was afraid to climb the ladder in his "bears" to go to bed and begged that the candle might be left burning, a state of mind so unprecedented that his mother would give him no rest until she got the truth out of him. Good mother that she was, she helped him fix it all up with God and Jed went off to sleep in tears of contrition mingled with joy at his providential escape from some horrible end as the consequence of his great transgression. He had been more wicked if anything than Peter in his denial of his Lord.

But what was that to the transgressions of Sailor John! He was both boisterous and fluent in his profanity, and Jed felt that all must be off with the paper, the town and the people in it, that the fate of York could not be other than that of Sodom and Gomorrah for harboring such a wicked man, so, much as Jed wanted to see the wonderful machinery gotten into the wonderful office building, he turned and fled home as fast as his feet could carry him, the safest place he knew when the brimstone should begin to writhe and sizzle, snap and fume. He had not a doubt that he had seen the wickedest man in the world.

In those days Jed's understanding of the ways of God with his children was clear and unquestioning. There were two places to go to after death and choice must be between them in advance. Delays were dangerous. If one had not made choice of heaven he would be sent to hell inevitably the very instant after death. Heaven Jed had glimpsed through the clouds. Hell he was not quite so sure about, except that it must be a good deal like the lime kiln on the creek bank down on the Serpentine, where Jed's father had burnt the rocks with oak wood. Jed's friend, Monroe Scranton, firing at night, had suffered Jed to look in when he thrust in more wood. Hell was a great deal hotter than that, Monroe had explained, because the fire was fed with the stuff that matches are made of, and hell was so big that the whole world could be chucked into it as easily as Monroe could chuck an oak limb into the furnace under the pit full of stone. Monroe insisted that if one had eyes sharp enough he could, by looking into that furnace, discover little "niggers" making jackknives, but of course only a silly would believe that. It was only when Monroe likened hell to such a furnace a thousand times bigger than the whole world that he was to be taken seriously.

There wasn't any church on the Serpentine. Sometimes, Sunday afternoons, religious services were held at the school-house in the little valley between the forks of the creek, and sometimes at the homes of the people, all crowding into the living room as close as matches in a box. In the first case a clergyman generally came out from York. In the latter Elder Giddings usually took the lead. He nearly lifted the roof off when he prayed and, so far as Jed could gather from what he said, we were all of us on the very brink of irretrievable disaster and nothing short of the most fervent beseeching, with groanings and deep amens from all over the room, could save us from awful death and endless misery ever after.

There was some kind of a difference between Jed's father and the rest of the men, and especially the ministers who came once in a while to preach, but Jed had no distinct idea what it was, only for once his father must be wrong or else all the rest of the people would not be so certain of it. He understood this much, though, Jed's father wanted the people to let him read to them printed sermons that had been delivered by Henry Ward Beecher or Theodore Parker instead of listening to Elder Giddings or sending to town for a minister. That made trouble and once as many as a dozen men, with two ministers, came to the home on the Serpentine and argued all day with Jed's father about those sermons of Theodore Parker's. They all talked about it and prayed about it and at last Jed's father agreed that if nobody wanted to hear the sermons he would not read them anywhere except at home, but if any one did want to hear them they could come to his house any Sunday and Jed's father would read them to whomever would listen. Only a few came, just two or three, and all the rest seemed much aggrieved.

After that Jed's father and the family seldom went to any of the other meetings but, if they did, there was sure to be a long argument among the men out of doors after the meeting was over. Jed had no idea what it meant, except that it must be very bad, but people said that Jed's father had been "excommunicated for heresy."

That seemed to hang like an infection about Jed's father for years after. More than once in after years, at revivals in York, Jed had heard his father made the special subject for prayer by the ministers, to which there were loud amens from all over the house. It was all very appalling, the more especially as people said it was all pure stubbornness of spirit in Jed's father and the fact that he was so good a man made his offense so infinitely worse that there could be almost no hope at all for him if he were to die. That worried Jed, because his father was never strong and had scarcely seen a well day since boyhood. That is why he did not go to the war, except to help repel "Pap" Price and his raiders. The recruiting officers would not take him.

Jed got to know Sailor John better afterward. They had elected Jed's father justice of the peace to sort of help him out with making a living while he was getting his paper on its feet. Sailor John had been on a protracted spree, had shot up a saloon or two, and had made trouble for the officers. It had taken half a dozen men to take him to the "calaboos," where he arrived kicking and cursing with half of one man's shirt in his fist and scarcely a rag of his own clothes on him. He was brought next morning very early before Jed's father to answer for his fault, handcuffs still on him. Some of the witnesses did not wish to be kept from their work. Early as it was there was a considerable crowd in the court room. Jed had been sent to the office to tell his father to come to breakfast, that it was waiting. Jed's father heard the witnesses, ordered the handcuffs removed and then said, "Come with me, Mr. Hare, let's go to breakfast. My wife sends word that it is waiting." "Damned if I don't. Squire," exclaimed the prisoner. "I'm hungrier than a wolf." So home they went to breakfast, Jed following after.

Having reached the house, Sailor John washed up, pulled his clothing together as well as he could and Jed's father gave him one of his own shirts to put on in place of the shreds the officers had left him. He ate everything offered him, slick and clean, and back they went to court. The crowd filed in. "Guilty or not guilty, Mr. Hare?" Jed's father demanded. "I want to know what you think about it."

"Oh! I'm guilty all right enough, I reckon," was the reply, "though I can't remember anything that happened after about the eighth or ninth drink. I'm mighty sorry, and besides, the weeds are growing in the corn and I don't know what the old woman 'll do if you send me to jail 'till husking time as the other squire did two years ago. It nearly floored us."

"Well, John," returned Jed's father, "the court sentences you to go home and plow corn and don't you leave the farm without my permission until the corn is all in the crib. If you do you may have to stay in jail all winter, but come with me to the office first. I want to talk things over with you in private," and off they went.

A little while after Jed burst into the little sanctum at the back of the office, supposing that Sailor John had gone, but he hadn't. He was crying and his blood-shot eyes were very red. "It's of no use, Squire," he said, "you don't know nothing at all about it. I've fought this thing ever since I was a half grown boy, and it gets me down three or four times a year in spite of hell and high water."

"But did you ever really ask God to help you? You've damned everything in sight a million times, the men that sold you the liquor and the fellow that drank it, but have you ever asked God to help you let the stuff alone?"

"Well, I reckon not, anyhow not the way you mean, though I've wished it hard enough."

"What do you say to our asking him now, here by ourselves? Jed, son, run out."

Jed closed the door, but from within he heard first his father's voice in prayer, very brief, then Sailor John's, louder, but sort of blunderingly and broken, and presently they came out, went down the stairs and Jed's father went with him to the ferry and saw him safely in the boat, from which he waved his hand a good-by.

As Jed's father returned to the office he was taken to task by one of the saloonkeepers whose place Sailor John had shot up the night before. "Squire," he said, "you ought to have made an example of that man. He might, as easily as not, have killed someone with that pistol."

"You should have thought of that before you sold him the liquor," was the reply. "You knew what his failing was as well then as you do now. But I'll make an example of him all right, an example that some of the rest of you may do well to pattern after."

"Huh! It is mighty little good you'll do trying any of your Sunday school ideas on that old ruffian. It is such men making hogs of themselves that makes us saloon men all our trouble. If it were not for them our business would be as much respected as any other. They ought to rot in jail for their conduct. He will be back here and drunk again before the month is out. Just mark my word!"

But that prophecy was not fulfilled. Sailor

John did not go on another spree for more than a year. He never quite conquered himself, but as often as he got into his cups he would either come to or send for Jed's father to take him to his home and make him stay there until he had sobered up. Jed's father spoke of him as one of his ten-pins that he had to set up as often as the saloon keepers bowled them over and if Jed's father was out pretty late at night, or was called away unexpectedly, Jed's mother consoled herself as best she could by reflecting that probably he was out setting up one of those pesky ten pins.

Jed's father wasn't regarded as much of a success as justice-of-the-peace and when he came up for re-election, after two years, he was defeated, in fact fairly snowed under. He sent few culprits to jail and the fines inflicted hardly more than met the costs. When delinquent youths were brought before him he generally sent for the father or mother, often for both of them, talked the matter over with them, sometimes with no little severity, and the upshot usually was that the parents took the delinquent home under promise to see that the offense complained of did not happen again.

Much complaint was found with this system of administering justice and one father, at least, made bold to tell Jed's father to his face that if he kept better watch of his own little "hellian," ransacking people's barns and melon patches, he could with greater consistency lecture others on their want of care of their children; all of which astonished Jed's father beyond measure and not a little interfered with Jed's care-free enjoyment of the "priceless boon," at least for a season; but Jed's father was a hard driven man and could not devote all his time to rounding Jed up and keeping him under surveillance. No one but Jed's maker could do that and he did not seem to want to have the bother either.

A trouble with Jed's father was that he was anywhere from one to two score years ahead of his time and "probation," anywhere outside of a Methodist meeting house, was not heard of for for full forty years after Jed's father's judicial career had been brought to an inglorious close, and yet he had applied that idea to adult and juvenile offenders alike.

Sailor John outlived them all, saloon keepers, officers and Jed's father, too. When the end came to Jed's father Sailor John came to the house and, leaning heavily on the gate, cried like a baby. The procession of carriages to the cemetery was the longest ever known in the history of York, but by that time Jed had become man-grown and he understood some things some better than he did in those early days when the saloon faction resented Jed's father's goodness as a reflection upon them, and the over-zealous church people resented it as a stubborn and wilful attempt to demonstrate that "making confession" was not indispensable to living a blameless life. They declared that his righteousness was, at best, as filthy rags and altogether inadequate unto salvation.

Nor was Sailor John the only reprobate who sorrowed when Jed's father died. There was old "Jack" Ashley, who complained bitterly of the officers for interfering with his personal liberty, insisting that no one could be called drunk until he was flat on his back feeling upward for the ground. He had to go back to jail to think it over, not being in a frame of mind to profit by one of those heart-to-heart conferences for which the little sanctum in the rear of the office finally became noted.

And just why is it that a good man is not only without honor in his own town and among his own people, but measurably without influence with his own children? Often a word from such a man spoken to a truant lad belonging to another family, may have all the value of a guideboard to a confused traveler at the parting of the ways. Many a sanctum talk with the sons of other men had influenced them for their great good when such talks with Jed rolled off him as water from the back of a duck. Why?

They little knew, those worthy people, that, while Jed's father never maintained family worship, said grace at table or made pretense to piety, he never in his life went to sleep without committing himself and his loved ones to his God, or lived a day that he did not reach up many times for divine help in words of prayer, breathed rather than articulated, and the reason that they suspected it not was that Jed's father felt that he was too unworthy to make public professions lest he fail so miserably to walk in the footsteps of The Christ as to cause his brother to stumble. In his last hours, when a minister implored him to "make his peace with his God while yet he had breath," his reply was: "I want my God to take me just as I am. I am not afraid," and so it was that he went.

But again the writer of this gets years and years ahead of Jed's story. That first day in town was big with consequences to Jed. He had moved into a mansion with real stairs, he had seen and heard the wickedest man in the world, and he made the acquaintance of Herb Pomeroy.

Mark Tulley was a traveling salesman for twenty-five years and has a fund of good stories of the road. He tells that one time he was in a town in central Kansas where a protracted revival meeting was going on. One of the residents of the town was named Toby. He was a tall, gaunt man with long whiskers, and was very fond of whisky, of which he frequently imbibed beyond his limit. This man was attending one of the meetings, and the revivalist was busy scoring every form of vice and calling down drastic condemnation upon them. "Woe to the drunkard! Woe to the drunkard! Woe to the drunkard!" he shouted in doleful tones. Old Toby got on his feet and tugged at his whiskers, and the fact that he stuttered only made his interruption the more marked. "G-g-g-uess th-th-at's m-m-e! I-I-I-I'm present!" The preacher went on. "Woe to the liars! Woe to the liars! Woe to the liars! Woe to the liars!" His voice was dolorous and sepulchral. Again old Toby got to his feet. He motioned around the room, swinging and pointing with his arms and fingers. "G-g-get up!" he commanded. "G-g-get up!" He's calling on s-s-ome of you fellers! I've answered p-p-present. It's your turn now, S-s-stand up and be c-c-counted!"—Kansas City Journal.

"We go to our shelves," Pascal says, "to take down an author, and lo, to our joy we find a man."

Department of Veterinary

If government were confined merely to protecting people in their individual rights it may be doubted if a place could be found in the scheme for a state department of veterinary, and yet no owner of any animal is safe so long as there is another animal abroad afflicted with a contagious disease. Animal industry is a most important factor in the industrial life of almost any people. Whole regions of some countries have been depopulated because the animals upon which the people have depended for a livelihood were carried off by some destructive malady, witness the rhinderpest in the Philippines and the tsetse fly in Africa. The newer philosophy of government is that government must act for the common good when the common good cannot be obtained without governmental action, as it certainly cannot without some safeguarding of the animal industry of the country.

It may be remarked at the outset that the Bureau of Animal Industry, in the Department of Agriculture of the United States government, has done a great work for that industry in the country at large and in many of the states and for many counties and neighborhoods in the several states, but, except there be interstate commerce to be protected, the national government cannot interfere in the affairs of any citizen, against his will, to deal with contagion. That must be left to the police power of each state.

Now the police power of the state, with reference to the protection of animal industry, is mainly exerted through the office of the State Veterinarian and, secondarily, through such live stock inspectors as county boards of supervisors may employ to act in conformity with instructions from the State Veterinarian.

The main office of the State Veterinarian is at Sacramento, and the Veterinarian himself is an appointee of the governor and answerable to the governor, an ideal way of securing responsibility and efficiency. Besides the State Veterinarian himself, who receives a salary of $3,600 a year, there is an assistant stationed at Los Angeles who receives $3,000 a year, a deputy with a salary of $1,800, a clerk with a salary of $1,600 and a state inspector who receives a salary of $1,500. Besides these salaries there is an allowance of $8,000 a year to the entire office to cover traveling and incidental expenses. The office was created by special statute in 1899, and has proven its usefulness in a thousand ways.

In addition to the above authorized expenditures the legislature sometimes allows special appropriations for special purposes, as, for instance, $18,000 to be used for eradicating the disease of scabies among sheep, the treatment to be carried on through a series of years.

So extremely individualistic are we that we Americans have a tendency to resent governmental interference even when it is for our own good, so there has been resistance at times to compulsory treatment of maladies affecting our animal friends but, with a better understanding of the common interest, co-operation has largely taken the place of opposition with great good to the state.

For instance, take the history of the effort to eradicate the Texas fever tick from the state. It has been estimated that this tick costs the United States $25,000,000 a year and time was when it cost California hundreds of thousands; but our state veterinary department, acting with the national Bureau of Animal Industry, and the authorities in the afflicted counties, has well-nigh redeemed California from the pest.

Take the disease known as scabies in sheep as another instance. Two years ago an investigation revealed the startling fact that practically 80 per cent of the sheep in California were afflicted with that distressing and costly malady. Two straight years of systematic dipping, enforced by law and efficiently seen to, has reduced the number of sheep still afflicted to less than 2 per cent. In a state that has more than 3,000,000 sheep, which constitute an important income-producing element of our commonwealth, this was an important achievement.

These instances, only two out of many, are given to show the student of affairs how important it is to have a broad view of the province of government and to exemplify the truth that we shall, as time passes, have more of government rather than less. We shall need to preserve our individualism from an exaggerated spirit of governmental regulation of individual life and activity, but, on the other hand, there is no more important truth to carry home to the minds of students of government than that we must also rid our American minds of that exaggerated individualism which makes us almost anti-social and very slow to profit from co-operative endeavor.

The State Veterinary Medical Board is merely a board for examining and certifying practitioners of veterinary science and has nothing to do with the Department of Veterinary above described.

PERSONALIA

At the banquet given by the medical women of St. Louis to the women physicians who attended the recent convention of the American Medical Association, Dr. Ida Hyde of the University of Kansas replied to the toast "The Women Laboratory Worker." After giving information in regard to her varied chemical experiences abroad and in the leading universities of this country Dr. Hyde declared the laboratory to be a great field for medical women. She asserted that it was practically an unoccupied field with a great demand for skilled workers and with great rewards for those who were willing properly to prepare themselves.

Mme. Emma Eames, in absolutely renouncing singing for two years, is following the command of an eminent Parisian musical instructor. She may not even practice for scales and will resist every request, even on the part of intimate friends, to strike a vocal note in private. Mme. Eames is assured that, if she rigidly adheres to this regime, leading at the same time as tranquil an existence as is possible, her voice will be restored to her in all its original beauty and strength.

Henry Russell, while motoring through Italy this summer, discovered by chance an untrained voice which he believes destined to rank with the greatest. Its possessor is 16-year-old Maria Cappa, daughter of an innkeeper of the village of Sinalunga, on the road from Florence to Siena. The girl is now placed in the care of Maestro Morangoni, who predicts that she will be one of the greatest stars of the operatic stage.

Fitting

THERE IS FITNESS in the suggestion that automobiles supplant carriages in funeral corteges inasmuch as the primacy of automobiles as causes of such functions is not to be disputed. More deaths, undeserved and tragic, are due to this cause than to railroads, street cars, the equine race, tornadoes and lightnings combined. We have become calloused to them. It is assumed that whoever can drive a horse can run an automobile. It is as if the locomotives on our railroads were being run by farm hands. What essential difference is there between locomotive and automobile except that a roadbed and track have been devised which the locomotive need not leave? Progressive legislation cannot do better than strictly to limit the operation of automobiles to those who have systematically learned how and have been certificated accordingly.

Suggested Substitutes

THE SLOT MACHINES of San Francisco formerly turned into the coffers of the city something approaching $200,000 a year in licenses, and proponents of these devices demand to know how the deficit is to be made good. As ways morally preferable there might be suggested the municipal ownership and operation of the new and enlarged tenderloin, the licensing of burglary and hold-up men, a head tax upon summary executions of citizens by automobiles, street cars and carelessly operated elevators, the letting to the highest bidder of rake-off privileges for policing Chinatown. There are ways innumerable of replenishing the municipal till without reintroducing those kindergarten devices for developing the gambling spirit.

A Job For the States

THREE-FOURTHS OF THE FORESTS of the nation are in private hands, three per cent of the forest lands in private hands are properly safeguarded against fire. Before sighing for new worlds to conquer would it not be well for the states to take these private owners in hand to compel a recognition on their part of their stewardship of an inheritance belonging in fee to the generation that now is and others yet to come?

Did Not Originate In San Francisco

DR. LYMAN ABBOTT, in the New York Outlook, tells this: "The story is told—I believe it is authentic—that a western cowboy arrested for murder wrote to Theodore Roosevelt for financial aid in securing competent defense, but subsequently returned the contribution, saying: 'I do not need it; we have elected the district attorney.'" Was that where our San Francisco higher-ups got their cue?

We Do It Now

BOTH POLITICAL PARTIES in California stand for the non-partisan nomination and election in future of judges. This paper stands for it now. There is no reason why press or people should wait. In making up its candidates for judicial preferment The California Weekly will not consider by what party any candidate be nominated. That issue has no place in selecting judges. The question is, is he fit? Therefore this paper nominates for election to the supreme bench William P. Lawlor of San Francisco. This is not saying that this paper will oppose the election of either Sloss or Melvin, but only that it stands for Judge Lawlor. California owes that man that promotion, not alone because, as elsewhere outlined in this paper, he is fit for the place, but because, being fit, he has proven himself a rock of imperturbable rectitude that all the power of millions and malice, of cunning and contumely, could not shake. Up from the people, Judge Lawlor is of the people, understands the people and is a proper custodian of their judicial interests. A health to Judge Lawlor!

The Mob

ACCORDING TO MR. BARNES of New York, the "Old Guard," the kept press and financial confidence men, Colonel Roosevelt has been swinging around the circle inciting the American mob to hysteria. What a splendid mob it was that he everywhere met! Mobs singing "America" and the "Star-Spangled Banner," mobs of trainmen, farmers, women holding up little children that they might see and not forget the most vital moral force the nation has known since the sixties, mobs at all the stations through which the train passed, mobs by day and mobs by night, mobs in sunshine and mobs in rain, hurrahing mobs, mobs crying "God bless you," and "Good-bye and good luck," mobs that answer with a whole-hearted amen the demand that there be one law for rich and for poor, one justice for citizen and corporation. A dangerous man, that Roosevelt! A dangerous mob spirit he is arousing in the breasts of ninety millions of people! The world do move.

The Issue the Man

NEXT TUESDAY HIRAM JOHNSON enters upon his final campaign of the state. On the surface both parties and both candidates stand for the same things. The sincerity of both is conceded. Beneath the surface there are differences that will develop as the campaign waxes. In Bell the people will discover the politician, the man adaptable to his environment whatever it may be, not questionable and not to be feared, but one who ever has before his mind's eye his political prospects. In Hiram Johnson they will find a man cast in larger mold, made of sterner stuff, capable of forgetting self in zeal for his cause. He will do impolitic things that Bell would not hazard, but he will strike blow on blow so clear and strong that no ear will doubt the message. As much difference as may be found between Taft and Roosevelt will be found between Bell and Johnson. In the present temper of state and nation little doubt can be entertained as to the choice that the Men of California will make.

Heney Coming Home

AFTER MONTHS SPENT IN RECUPERATING his vitality exhausted in three years of unrequited service for the establishment of justice in his home city, service that will be remembered as long as the infamies he fought, Francis J. Heney is coming home, coming, we hope, to stay. He is a man whom San Francisco cannot afford to lose, a man whom California cannot afford to lose, a man who, by his persistence in the cause of civic righteousness, will yet command the respect, as he already commands the fear, of his detractors. Good news: Heney is coming home and he will be greeted as befits the occasion by men capable of a sustained moral purpose. They are not few, no, not even in San Francisco.

Uncle Joe's Fight

AS THIS PAPER GOES TO PRESS a battle is raging in the eighteenth congressional district of Illinois between Uncle Joe Cannon and silvery haired Parson Henry B. Downs, and the issue is, "Drink Joe Cannon Whisky Eight Years Old," and "Touch not, taste not, handle not the accursed stuff." If the women could vote Parson Downs might have a fighting chance instead of a chance to fight.

The Madera Case

The Madera case, lately decided by Judge Wellborn of the United States district court of Southern California, holding that the granting of a franchise to a water company does not preclude a municipality from entering into competition with a private water company, has attached to it a certain degree of importance. It has not been contended that such franchise rights were exclusive, or that similar franchises might not be granted to another company. Why, then, should not a city have a right to do what it may authorize another company to do?

The policy of competitive franchises is another issue, and the ability to float bonds for the construction of competitive water or light systems would be another. The abstract right, important though it is, is the smallest toad in that puddle, especially in the case of a large municipality where the investment runs up into millions.

British custom and parliament prevent municipal ownership except where the ground is first cleared of private rights through their capitalization and payment, but then the British government is founded on privilege. Massachusetts will not grant a competitive franchise unless the volume of business clearly justifies doubling the investment, but Massachusetts is dominated by the spirit of the investor rather than that of the consumer.

Nevertheless, fair play requires that no private corporation investing in a public utility be ruthlessly ruined unless it is itself so iniquitous as to be outlawed. The need is for a summary, certain, workable means for clearing the ground, as in England, before venturing upon municipal ownership, but a judicial inhibition upon municipal competition with an established private enterprise would be a poor beginning for such an end.

The public is in far graver danger of being made the victim of extortion on the part of a public service corporation than a public service corporation is of having its property confiscated through municipal competition. Every municipality is more inclined to be generous than any public service corporation is to be just, and it is the injustice of public service corporations that makes municipal ownership even a debateable question.

Bourbonism In Business

The characteristics of Bourbonism are that it never learns anything and never forgets anything that it has learned, that it will concede everything to force but nothing as of right. This was the spirit of the employers in the cloakmaking industry in New York. For nine weeks they withstood the demands of their workers at a cost to the workers of many millions in wages and more millions still to the employers in loss of business to other manufacturers. In the end they conceded practically all that was demanded, yet haggling to the last for a "principle" (the open shop) that they waived in effect if not in terms. That is Bourbonism in its purity and it characterizes a considerable part of the employing world. It tends to justify the feeling in the ranks of labor that no good is to be gained for those who toil except at the end of a fight to a finish, that pleas for justice and mercy fall on dead ears and only power is respected.

These are the things that the cloakmakers were fighting for: free electric power, the closing of the sweatshops and the requiring that all work be done at the factories under sanitary conditions, six days' work a week and a weekly payday, nine hours to constitute a day's work for five days in the week and five hours on Saturday, no subcontracting in the factory, the price of piecework to be agreed upon by a committee of employers and employees, double pay for overtime, the disciplining of any manufacturer who unjustly discriminates among his employees, the "preferential union shop" in lieu of the closed, the manufacturer having the right to prefer one union person to another in any instance, but not to employ non-union workers so long as there are union workers to select from, the unions to admit all fit persons to their unions without prejudice, collective bargaining and, whether union workers are employed or not, union standards as to wages and conditions to be observed.

Why should it be necessary in any enlightened state for civil war to be waged for such contentions of justice as these? Why should the workers be compelled to endure privation, eviction from their homes and other hardships for contentions scarcely one of which should have been disputed? And why should any commonwealth be without a proper commission or tribunal to make prompt inquiry into every such cause of complaint and report to the public all the facts that the power of public sentiment may be invoked on the side of justice and fair dealing? Until such impartial tribunals or commissions of inquiry do exist we have small cause to boast of our civilization. Until the employing world shakes off the spirit of Bourbonism and evinces a willingness to do right because it is right it must not be surprised or pained if the presumption in every labor war, that the employers are in the wrong, be accepted without question.

The fault lies in that materialistic conception that man and mule, woman and steam, childhood and electric energy, industrially considered, are commodities and to be similarly reckoned. The humanhood of labor must be so insisted upon in season and out that no employer will ever think of it as commodity.

What Are We Going To Do About It?

Lee O'Neil Brown, the God-fearing dealer in Democratic votes purchased for the election of Lorimer to represent Illinois in the United States senate, has been duly acquitted on one of the charges against him. It is unquestioned that he paid a thousand dollars to Assemblyman White, another thousand each to Beckemeyer and Meyers, with a "reward" of another thousand to Link, besides fitting out one Wilson with a legislative "jackpot" to take to St. Louis to dispense to other members of the Lorimer Democratic "bunch."

The evidence of his guilt came chiefly from fellow conspirators, with no great amount in corroboration, and Lee O'Neil Browne refused to take the witness stand to either affirm or deny the testimony. He sat back upon his haunches, after the example set him by our San Francisco grafters, and demanded of the people, "What are you going to do about it?"

What are we? The issue is as pertinent in California as in Illinois.

Back of this man Browne are the corruptionists who furnished the money. So long as he holds his peace they, the supremely guilty ones, whether Lorimer or some corporation interested in his election, rest secure even from taint, and he rests secure in the belief that the pouring out of yet more money by his backers, to be used in jury tampering and political machinations, will see him through unscathed, just as the associated villainies in San Francisco saw their retainers safely through their ordeals, so far as stripes and prison walls are concerned. Their good names they are powerless to give back to them, but that is one of the risks that go with the job of subverting justice and destroying free government.

What are we going to do about it?

These infamies are, unfortunately, constitutional guaranties. They are part of that old nationalism for which vested interests are contending. The spirit of the newer nationalism must, as Colonel Roosevelt so clearly declared, not only stand for fair play according to the old rules of the game, but the rules themselves must be changed, and that change must not stop short of their fundamental origin, in the organic laws of the nation and its commonwealths.

For one thing, cases of certain classes, and perhaps of all classes, must, where their importance warrants it, be prosecuted by the state with all the power of the whole state, and not of that of a mere county in a state, to sustain that prosecution. The state must have all the rights that the defendant has.

Refusal to testify should be accepted by a jury as implying that if the witness had testified he would have testified against himself. The law needs a sternness that it has not had for a century. No power less puissant than capitalized scoundrelism can bring capitalized scoundrelism to justice, and if that form of scoundrelism be not brought to justice then human rights are done for and human liberty becomes a joke.

The Scent of Treason

In one of his Colorado addresses Theodore Roosevelt sent this message to Arizona and New Mexico. "Do not make your constitutions difficult to amend." This message, coupled with his criticism of certain decisions of the supreme court of the United States, and his declaration at Ossawatimie, that, "This newer nationalism regards the executive as the steward of the public welfare," have caused certain eastern journals to raise the cry of treason, treason to the constitution as it is and to those orderly processes of amendment that virtually make it impossible to amend our nation's constitution at all.

We shall do well to understand that our constitution as it is was not given from Sinai. It was made by men, and the feet of many of those men were of clay, half baked at that, else they never would have submitted to that three-fifths clause which Garrison fitly characterized as a "covenant with hell," for it took four years of hell to get rid of it. It sanctioned the permanency of slavery.

These fleshly-vestured men provided in their "immortal document" that the law as they laid it down should never be amended except upon the initiative of two-thirds of the states or two-thirds of the members of both houses of congress, and then only upon ratification by three-fourths of the states. Twelve states can now refuse what thirty-four states demand, and it is not too much to say that Wall street influence can buy up the legislatures of twelve states whenever it feels its vested interests at stake, whenever it is seriously proposed to make property subordinate to manhood instead of manhood subordinate to property. We need a national constitutional convention, if for no other purpose, then to make it easier to amend the constitution of the United States.

There is, however, one other method of so amending the constitution of the United States as to make it fit the constitution of the American people, and that is through judicial interpretation. To suggest that it be so done is to lay one open to the charge of treason. Make the most of it. It has been done a hundred times since the constitution was adopted, if not a thousand. John Marshall did it by wholesale with his doctrine of implied powers. It must be done as many times more if that "immortal document" is to be saved from destruction. The feet of a nation are not to be bound by a parchment.

It is as necessary for the supreme court to be of the people and from the people, thinking the things that the people think and feeling the things that the people feel, as it is that congress and the executive shall be of and from the people. There may be a natural law of human society, as there is a natural law of chemistry, biology, astronomy, for aught we know, but if there be such a natural law it has not been discovered. The law is therefore what we make it and we make it by choice, by legislation, by executive policy and by judicial decision. If these be not one and all of the people we may rest assured they will not be for the people and will not fit the people's needs.

President Taft professes himself a liberal constructionist. Let us hope that in reconstructing the Supreme Court of the United States, as he must, he will fill that bench with judges at any rate as liberal in their construction of the constitution as himself. Otherwise harm must come to the country or to the judiciary, perhaps to both.

Face to the Future

"New times demand new measures and new men," wrote Lowell more than half a century ago and he lived to see, and be a part of, a history-making epoch difficult for the world to keep pace with. It seemed to the vested interests of those days certain that property and country, perhaps civilization itself, were heading for destruction.

Out of this struggle the Republican party was born. The times were new, the measures it espoused were new and new men rose to leadership and great strides were taken. Then the party rested from its labors and for a quarter of a century lived on a nation's gratitude to its saviors. It was pensioned as the veterans of the Civil War were pensioned, and it fell into the control of conservatism. Its "new men" of another era had grown old, affecting slippared ease. The party abounded in wise counsels, but cherished few enthusiasms. It became carnal-minded, and the hand of death reached for it, for to be carnal-minded is death.

Then there broke upon its startled ears the boom and rattle of war. It aroused itself. Old heroes with stiffening joints responded to the call and, by pressure of events rather than inspired purpose, strode forward and made the American nation a world power. Then these men rested and with them rested the party in whose ranks they had wrought so well.

But the times did not rest. The struggle upward of the common man did not rest. Madness for money did not rest, nor did that hunger for power and privilege that has been the slave-owner of all history. These impulses and inspirations have never known what it is to rest and to say: "My work is finished. I have enough." The upward pressure of the rise of the common man and the downward pressure of the amalgamated millions of illicitly acquired capital forced new issues, new times and conditions and made imperative the demand for new measures and new men.

Those who cannot keep up with the cohorts of progress within the Republican party will drop out of its ranks. Not many who are burdened with much luggage will be able to keep up. Those staggering under millions will halt and turn their faces to the past. They will fall into line with the slower marching hosts of the Democratic party under the leadership of Judson Harmon of Ohio, relict of the Cleveland regime. Judson Harmon will not be less satisfactory to vested interests than was Grover Cleveland.

"But the Republican party is divided?" It certainly is, from stem to stern, and so is the Democratic party, and on precisely the same line of division. As there are Roosevelt Democrats so were there Cleveland Republicans. Republicans who "hark back" will fall into the Democratic ranks. May they find rest to their perturbed spirits! Democrats who face the future with the light of hope in their eyes will become Republicans. They will fight with Roosevelt.

These things are said in spite of a few surface indications to the contrary. The Democratic victory in Maine was won by Republicans chiefly as their only means of protesting against that standpatism that has dominated their party in Maine for a third of a century. Ohio is likely to be carried by the Democrats for the same reason. It may seem an illogical thing to do, but it is the only way of protesting effectively. These are evidences of a breaking up of old alignments preparatory to making new.

What of California? Here both parties seem to have faced the future. Unquestionably they have meant to, but this is a phase of the problem that will pass within a few months. The Democracy of California will not be at cross purposes with the Democracy east of the mountains. In 1912 it will fall into line with the older nationalism under the Harmon banner. Democrats who helped to nominate Hiram Johnson will help to elect him. Republicans who cannot join in the enthusiasm for the newer nationalism of Roosevelt will vote for Bell, not because they like Bell better than Johnson, but as a protest against the Republican quickstep with which they cannot keep pace. It is going to be an interesting conflict, and it may be closer than many suppose.

Let no one be deceived as to the issue. Neither platform recently adopted in this state fully expressed it. Perhaps the issue cannot yet be reduced to exact statement. It is the newer nationalism vs. the older; property for man rather than man for property; law interpreted to fit the fact rather than a philosophy of what that fact ought to be but is not; a reaching out toward the future instead of a clinging to the past and its time-sanctioned wrongs. It is to be a "bully fight." Get into it. "New times demand new measures and new men." Help to meet that demand.

The President Sees a Light

The President is no Bourbon. He can learn and because he can learn there is hope for his administration. The letter of his private secretary to an Iowa unknown makes this clear.

It was denied that he had withheld patronage from insurgent members of congress. Now he admits it and explains why. It was because they "seemed to be in opposition to the administration's efforts to carry out the party platform." Where he made his mistake was in looking upon "the administration's efforts" as the test of loyalty to the party platform.

Now the "administration's efforts" were the efforts of Wickersham, Ballinger, Aldrich, Hale, Lodge, Elkins and a few other leaders of the party machine, all servants of the "interests." There is small wonder that free men were found in opposition to such "efforts," but they were a great deal more loyal to the party platform than the advisors of the administration and, when the "administration's efforts" got whipped into proper shape the insurgents stood for them.

The President is hitching toward the right notch by notch as the returns come in. By the time they are all in he will probably be all right.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Last week we talked in this department of the value of the independent soul and the right that each person has, man or woman, husband or wife, to live an own life, neither crushed by the dominance of a stronger personality nor absorbed into any other life short of the life of the infinite.

There runs a story that, upon the occasion of a great musical feast held in London thirty or forty years ago, a noted orchestral leader had gotten together many hundreds of players with their many hundreds of instruments to practice for the final event. The roar of melody was tremendous. In the middle of a chorus he signalled silence and then called out in anger: "The flageolet! The flageolet!" The flageolet players had gone through the motions of playing without making a sound and his trained ear had caught them at it, notwithstanding the hundreds of other instruments.

It has been declared by some idealist with imagination enough to go to the ultimate concept that human society has not so many units in its make-up that it can afford to lose one from the resultant; that not until heaven shall have created two persons exactly alike can the world afford to lose the reaction of any one from the general effect.

Anyhow those societies have gotten on least well that have allowed the narrowest scope for individual development and individual initiative. The ancients got their governments and their religions so inextricably mixed with the authority of king and priest, oracle and soothsayer, that the individual counted for nothing. The orientals, the true ancients of our own day, have done the same thing, with the result that, while their imitative powers are great, their creative powers are little and their respective countries have marked time for centuries while the soul of the occident has gone on to subjugate the powers of nature and to possess itself of the earth and the fullness thereof.

When General William T. Sherman stood in Washington reviewing his 60,000 soldiers who had marched with him through Georgia and up the coast he declared that every man of them all was fit to command a regiment and could do it if the emergency required. His army was not a fighting machine. It was vastly better than that. It was made up of sixty thousand individuals with powers of initiative unimpaired voluntarily co-operating for a cause upon the success of which they had staked their lives in all unselfishness.

It is such another army as that, only ten times as numerous, that this country of ours now needs to redeem it to higher ideals, an army of 600,000 volunteers in the cause of Right Things, striving co-operatively, yet with powers of originality and initiation unimpaired, to make right might, each in his own way in his own sphere, taking orders from none but God and his Christ, calling no man master and holding the individual soul unconquerable. The gates of hell cannot prevail against such a host.

There are those who look upon Socialism as a menace to human progress, but when asked their reason why their fear is usually found to be that Socialism will confiscate the material things of the world wherever they find them and redivide them, giving to each a similar share. That is the objection to Socialism with which we may be least concerned. The spirit of Socialism is the spirit of ancient and orient which would order society after immutable laws, reducing civilization to a system that would destroy the initiative and make the individual indistinguishable in the mass. That would be not only to turn the clock backward, but to make it run backward, to face toward the dawn of creation, not to follow the star of empire toward the West. We may owe to the state all that we have, and all that we are save the individuality of the soul. That belongs to the individual and to his God alone.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Now the Dreadnoughts May Go

"It is to laugh," or it is to sigh, when one reads that Great Britain now has under active consideration a plan for constructing a vessel of war so effectively deadly that it must supercede the Dreadnoughts, make of them Dread-somethings and render them obsolete. The infinite folly, thus to be emphasized, of little man's ceaseless effort to attain perfection in the art of murdering his fellow men—surely one may laugh at the futility of efforts thus pitifully forlorn, but the smiles should be washed by the tears of all who have minds to realize and hearts to feel. But, regardless of both smiles and tears, it certainly is a fact that one of the greatest of English ship-building firms, acting under the supervision of the Admiralty, now is planning for the construction of a monster of war which, if successful, is to have the capacity to annihilate Dreadnoughts. The idea is simple, it being nothing more than to decrease the weight and the space occupied by the engines, do away with the funnels, and thus give room for a greater number of more efficient guns. It is proposed to attain this end by introducing an engine of the "producer gas" type which would use crude oil as fuel. It is calculated that this would save so much in space and weight that it would add enormously to the vessel's fighting capacity. There would be practically no smoke, and this would make the vessel less visible as a target. Briefly stated, thus stands the plan, and, if it proves to be effective, the hundreds of millions of dollars invested in Dreadnoughts will be as scattered to the four winds. But, then, what of it? Does not all history demonstrate that people are ready and willing to pay for perfecting the noble art of killing other people? Selah! Let it go at that.

Great Britain to Own Telephone System

At the present time the National Telephone Company owns and operates the telephone system of Great Britain. It will continue to do so until the close of the year 1911, but after that it will step down and out. At that time the government will assume ownership and control of the property, paying the company the value of the property as inventoried by experts. It need hardly be said that the service now is in most execrable condition, for it is not in human nature to give close attention to that which soon is to be lost. Indeed, the service is said to be so unbearably bad that government management cannot well make it other than better, although, of course, many difficulties must be surmounted in beginning. In its very inception the enterprise will add 18,000 names to the list of civil service employees. Some idea of the immensity of the undertaking may be formed by considering facts connected with the business the company did last year. It handled 1,362,000,000 messages, had 1,569 exchanges and 516,888 subscribers, and its annual revenue runs from $17,500,000 to $20,000,000. It will be recognized that it is something of a burden which Johnnie Bull is shouldering, but his shoulders are broad and he feels that there will be both financial recompense and better service for the people in the job. All of which might suggest the question whether similar governmental action would be beneficial in this country, but, of course, this would lead up to discussion too broad to be considered here.

How About Your Monoplane Hat, Sister?

Be up and doing. Get into the swim. Buy your monoplane hat before it is everlastingly too late, and thus demonstrate that you are about as classy as some of the rest of them. That is, you should do this if you are a woman; if you are a man you are only indirectly interested, although you may have the privilege of paying for the creation. For the laudable purpose of reassuring any faint-hearted one, let it at once be announced that the monoplane hat is a Parisian device for covering the feminine head, and hence there can be no doubt that it is strictly all right. This latest hat monstroswhat we intended to say is that this latest perfect dream of a hat was invented to commemorate Moissant's flight from Paris to England, and naturally any fair lady should be glad to immortalize such an event at any cost of making herself ridiculous. The hat has a wing on each side, each shaped like a monoplane's wing and over a foot long. The entire structure covers more than three feet in width. Some sweep, isn't it? And it must be perfectly lovely! But, after all, the chief glory of the hat is its hatpins. On the ends of these are miniature propellers with wooden blades. The real thing, too, mind you, and when milady walks the blades whirl blithely in the breeze. Would it be possible to think of anything more delightful, unless it were a hat consisting of an automobile in full action? Ah, those Parisians! It does hurry us some to keep our costumes up to the mark set by their inventive genius, but, of course, we have to do it—and thus again do we frequently exemplify the tragedy of life.

Telephone Supplants Telegraph

Is it possible that the telephone eventually will supplant the telegraph to a large extent as a medium for the transmission of ideas and nearideas? Whatever may be the answer to this question, it is certain that the former is making notable inroads upon the field formerly occupied by the latter. An illustration of this tendency is found in the fact that the Lackawanna railroad has entirely dispensed with the telegraph for train dispatching and has substituted the telephone for it. The experiment first was tried in 1908 on the 63 miles of road between Scranton, Pa., and Binghamton, N. Y., and it was so successful that at the present time the company has equipped 271 stations and relies exclusively upon the 'phone in its train-dispatching operations. It is claimed that a great saving of time has resulted, it being easier to summon stations and calls being answered more promptly. It is quite likely that other railroads will follow the Lackawanna's lead.

Another Test of Intelligence

Many and sometimes surprising have been the suggested tests of man's intelligence and intellectual ability, but it has remained for a Dr. Warburg, of Cologne, to suggest one so absolutely new that it probably never had occurred to anyone other than him. If the doctor's test is as reliable as it is simple, it is going to be very easy hereafter to determine the size of anybody's intellect. Just place a collection of colors before the individual under investigation, and if he distinguishes and names them readily he is intellectually bright; if he does not he is dull. The simple statement sounds like an attempt to ridicule the doctor's overflow from the fountain of science—which heaven forbid!—but it is nothing of the sort. It is a brief, unexaggerated announcement of the doctor's theory, as he has presented it to the world of savants. Moreover, he says that he has tried it on the pupils in public schools until he is convinced that there is nothing wrong with it: The bright pupils distinguished the colors; the dull ones were unable to do so. The question might arise, Do the colors affect the intellect, or does the intellect affect the colors? But this is going so far in the scientific method of investigation that we grone. Anyway, show your child some colors, and thus measure his intellect, for it should be a gratification to know just where he stands in this important respect.

A Bas Stage Fright!

Nearly every good actor suffers from stage fright. A good actor has temperament, otherwise he could not act, and temperament implies sensitiveness to emotion. The sensitive man who can face a critical audience without a tremor probably does not exist.

But Dr. Pierce Bonner, of Paris, thinks he has found the nerve of sensitiveness of this particular kind, that he can lay hold of it with his pincers, apply a hot iron to it, and—sizz! nerve and stage fright are gone forever. Dr. Bonners' theory is that stage fright is attributable to an involuntary contraction of the diaphragm. The muscles of the diaphragm are connected with a facial nerve that runs up through the nose. Kill the nerve, and this connection between the diaphragm and the brain is cut off, and the stage fright is ended. Which suggests that stage fright is really what we had always supposed it to be, a matter of nerve. But isn't this business of interrupting nervous connections, once to stop stage-fright, as Dr. Bonner proposes, next to eradicate crime, as somebody else proposes, next to overcome cowardice, as a third proposes, rather going to limits that may have ulterior results in unexpected ways? Maybe Nature had other uses for that nerve than merely to cause stage fright.

STORY OF MASCAGNI'S CAREER

The following, from the New York Times, gives a vivid picture of the life of Pietro Mascagni, whose popular "Cavalleria Rusticana" is known to all the world, and whose new opera "Ysobel," is to be produced for the first time in America.

Pietro Mascagni was born at Leghorn on Dec. 7, 1853. His father was a baker, and intended that his son should be a lawyer. He discouraged the boy's attempts to learn music. The young composer, compelled to prosecute his musical studies by stealth, secretly became a pupil at the Instituto Luigi Cherubini, where his principal instructor was Alfredo Soffredini.

As a matter of course, Mascagni's father found out how his son was spending his leisure time, and the musical career of the future composer of "Cavalleria Rusticana" would have come to an untimely close had it not been for an amiable uncle who came forward and offered to adopt the young musician. Transferred to his uncle's house, Mascagni devoted himself in earnest to music, and the first fruits of his labors appeared in the shape of a symphony in C minor—an immortal key—for small orchestra, and a Kyrie written to celebrate the birthday of Cherubini, both of which works were performed at the Instituto in 1879.

In 1879 "In Filanda," a cantata for solo voices and orchestra, was produced, and was favorably mentioned in a prize competition instituted by the International Exhibition of Music at Milan. These semi-successes reconciled Mascagni's father to the idea of making his son a musician, and so when his uncle died in 1881 he returned to his father's house, where he was allowed to study music in peace.

His next composition was a setting of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," which Beethoven had set in the finale of the Ninth Symphony. This was performed at the Teatro degli Avvalorati with enough success so that Count Florestano de Larderel, a wealthy amateur, offered on the spot to pay for the composer's education at the Milan Conservatoire.

Mascagni's career at Milan was not a success. In spite of the sympathy and encouragement of his teachers, among whom were Amilcare Ponchielli and Michel Saldino, he found the course of regular study insupportable. He struggled through fugues and counterpoint for a time, but finally ran away with a traveling opera company. For years he led a life of obscurity and privation. He had little time for composition, but doubtless he learned a great deal about orchestras in his experience with the little companies of which he was the chef d'orchestre. After many wanderings he settled in Cerignola, near Foggia, where he managed to make a living by giving piano lessons.

In 1889 the publishing company of Sonzogno offered prizes for the best operatic composition submitted to them, and Mascagni's opera "Cavalleria Rusticana" won the prize and rescued its composer at once from obscurity. The opera was performed at the Costanzi Theatre in Rome on May 18, 1890. It was received at its first performance with tumultuous applause, and the composer awoke the next morning a famous man. He was greeted as a successor of Verdi, and medals were struck in his honor. He was welcomed back to the town of Leghorn with illuminations and torchlight processions, and the King of Italy presented him with the Order of the Crown of Italy, an honor not accorded to Verdi until he had reached middle life.

"Cavalleria" at once made the tour of Italy and soon crossed the Alps. It was produced in Berlin during the summer of 1890; in London in October, 1891; at the Opera Comique in Paris in January, 1892, and by Oscar Hammerstein in New York. Everywhere its success was unquestionable, and since then this opera has had a decided influence on a certain group of composers, known as the Italian verists. A mushroom crop of one-act melodramas sprang up, each more squalid in subject than the last.

Mascagni's next work was "L'Amico Fritz," which was produced at the Teatro Costanzi on Oct. 31, 1891. "I Rantzau" was brought out at the Teatro della Pergola, Florence, on Nov. 10, 1892. "Guglielmo Ratcliff," which was produced at the Scala in Milan in February, 1895, was a work of the composer's student days which had been revised and rewritten.

During March, 1895, "Silvano" was produced at the Scala. Meanwhile Mascagni had been appointed director of the Conservatoire at Pesaro, and his next work, "Zanetto," was produced there March 2, 1896.

"Iris," produced at the Constanzi on Nov. 22, 1898, has been the composer's most successful opera since "Cavalleria." The work was introduced to this country in concert form by the composer himself when he visited this country some years ago, and it was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House two years ago with Mme. Eames and Caruso and Scotti in the principal parts.

Mascagni hit upon a novel method for producing his next opera, "Le Maschere." On Jan. 17, 1901, it was produced simultaneously in seven different Italian cities. His next work, "Amica," was brought out at Monte Carlo during March, 1905. Mascagni has also written a cantata for the Leopardi centenary, and the incidental music for Hall Caine's play, "The Eternal City."

MASCAGNI'S MECHANICAL COMPOSER

"I have attached to my pianoforte a new machine, which records automatically every note which is sounded," says Pietro Mascagni, the composer of "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Ysobel." There are a number of delicate levers attached to the lower ends of the keys, which force down the point of a pen making a line, or a mechanical arrangement making a series of dots (according to whether a black or a white key has been struck), on a piece of revolving paper, and thus an improvised composition remains recorded exactly, the length of the line showing the duration of the note, and the character of the line, whether continuous or dotted, showing where the natural scale becomes changed and where not. I do much composing in this way."

NEW ENCYCLOPEDIA BRITANNICA

In issuing an eleventh edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, the University of Cambridge is taking over the work begun by The London Times in 1903. Even though Hugh Chisholm, one of the editors of the tenth edition, had begun work on the preparation of an eleventh edition, latterly the authorities in Printing House square came to the conclusion that the enterprise was too vast to be an addition to the activities of the great newspaper, and Cambridge took up the scheme.

Californian Poets' Corner

VIOLETS

By Emilie Lawson

One of the early and much esteemed writers of California was Emilie Lawson. Several of her poems appear in Poetry of the Pacific, the early collection of California verse made by May Wentworth.

On the blue ocean of air
Slow drifts the ambery moon;
The dew hangs its pearls in the willow's pale hair;
But my soul drifts on dreams to a moonlight more fair,
When the dusk came too late, and the dawn came too soon,
One long vanished June.

Lily-bells shake at my feet;
Heliotropes nod at my head;
And the rarest of roses make the air sweet;
But I think of a blossom-time—precious and sweet—
Till the ghosts of dead violets over me shed
Lost odors instead.

BURTON'S ENGLISH NOVELISTS

Prof. Richard Burton's lectures, delivered at the summer school of the University of California a few months ago, have now been published in book form, by Henry Holt & Co., under the title, "Masters of the English Novel." The following review of the book, from the Springfield Republican, will be of great interest to the hundreds who followed Professor Burton's lectures with intense enthusiasm:

In "Masters of the English Novel," Richard Burton goes back to Richardson and the 18th century beginnings and treats of the principal novelists down to Hardy, Meredith and Robert Louis Stevenson, with a closing chapter on "Fiction and the novel." He observes that while all novels are fiction, all fiction is by no means novels, and he quotes from Steele's "Tender Husband": "Our amours can't furnish out a romance; they'll make a very pretty novel." This clearly marks, observes the author, a distinction, and it gives a hint as to the departure made by Richardson in 1742, when he published "Pamela." Mr. Burton defines for his purposes the modern novel as "a study of contemporary society with an implied sympathetic interest." Love is the chief motor force, "simply because love it is which binds together human beings in their social relations."

From the first, he holds, the English novel has stood for truth, and he agrees with W. D. Howells and Henry Alden that "it has grown on the whole more truthful with this generation, as our conception of truth in literature has been widened and become a nobler one." The increased realism with which appearance, speech, setting, and actions of characters are portrayed in modern English fiction produces "a semblance of life which adds tenfold to its power." To illustrate this he compares the dialogue of modern masters like Hardy, Stevenson, Kipling and Howells with the best of the early writers: "It is the difference between the idiom of life and the false literary tone and imitations of life which with all their merits are still self-conscious and inapt." Also the psychology of modern novels is more complicated and more truthful: "Human nature is depicted in a novel as a curious compound of contradictory impulses and passions, and instead of a clear-cut separation of the sheep and the goats we look forth upon a vast indiscriminate horde of humanity whose color broadly surveyed seems a very neutral gray—neither deep black nor shining white."

In his account of the American contribution, though he treats only of the writers of the past, he remarks that, "The modern realistic movement has been affected to some degree by the work, has responded to the influence of the two Americans, Howells and James. What has been accomplished during the last forty years has been largely under their leadership. Mr. Howells, true to his own definition, has practiced the more truthful handling of material in depicting chosen aspects of the native life. Mr. James, becoming more interested in British types, has, after a great deal of analysis of his own countrymen, passed by the bridge of the international novel to a complete absorption in transatlantic studies, making his peculiar application of the realistic formula to the inner life of the spirit, a curious compound, a cosmopolitan Puritan, an urban student of souls." He concludes that while Henry James's influence is perhaps less obvious than that of Howells, it is none the less indisputable.

Bret Harte does not fall within the scope of the present volume because "although he essayed full length fiction it was not his forte." As to Mark Twain, also, Mr. Burton has to raise the question, whether he is novelist, humorist, or critic. Of Hawthorne he says: "For some the style of Hawthorne may now be felt to possess a certain artificiality: the price paid for that effect of stateliness demanded by the theme and suggestive also of the fact that the words were written over half a century ago."

WILLIAM P. LAWLOR

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

A short, thickset figure of a man, dressed in black; a smooth-shaven face, seamed with lines of character; the thoughtful eyes and knit brows of a student; a crown of unruly, curly white hair—that is the first visual impression of Judge William P. Lawlor.

As one talks with him, other impressions are added. His voice is soft and his manner gentle. He talks fluently, and with a fine choice of words from an unusually large vocabulary. Two things constantly impress you as he speaks: his earnestness and his anxiety always to be fair. In describing even trivial things, he obviously is trying to use the words and phrases that will tell exactly how the thing looked or happened, to describe it in just proportion, so as to convey to the auditor the exact impression in its proper outlines and correct detail. And this is done, not at all to make his own appearance in the narrative attractive, because the same method is used by him to describe incidents in which he himself appears at a disadvantage. One is impressed with the conviction that he is searching for the truth, the facts, just as they are, and that he goes to any needed pains to get at the facts and to reproduce them. When he has achieved a full and fair statement of the truth, he is satisfied to go on to other subjects, but he obstinately holds your attention to the subject in hand until this is done.

Another impression of the man is his simplicity. You see it in the sober and inconspicuous dress, you see it in the quiet good taste of his room at the Family Club, you see it in the absence of gesture or emphasis in his manner, and you see it most strikingly in the straightforward earnestness of his speech, in which there is not a trace of declamation nor a superfluous adjective. Earnestness—that is the thing that strikes you, earnestness in a constant endeavor to find the truth and state it.

I reiterate these first impressions of candor and sincerity because they are exactly the things that newspapermen learn not to look for in men in public life. What we expect to find—because we usually do find it—is a pose, an effort to impress, what commercial travelers call "throwing a front." We have seen so many examples of the "solemn ass" who poses as profound, and of the "bluff and hearty" hale fellow who poses as sincere, that we are wary of both breeds. Judge Lawlor belongs to neither class. He talks too freely on too many subjects to maintain the pose of the first, and he talks with too little thought of appearances to belong to the second. If man to man impressions count for anything, Judge Lawlor is genuine.

Judge Lawlor is a fine blend of two types of man, the man of the world and the student. He was left a full orphan at the age of ten, and he has fought his way up in the world from bobbin boy in a cotton mill, from work in the quicksilver mines, up through the practice of the law to an honored place on the bench. It is these experiences with the world of things as they are that give him, though a bachelor, his keen insight into the problems of childhood and of poverty and his ready sympathy with people in distress. He knows, because he has been there, and has not forgotten. On the other hand, he is a scholarly man, profoundly in love with books. Two walls of his room are stacked from floor to ceiling with them, hundreds of volumes in the rich dress of leather bindings that a booklover buys when he can. His speech alone would betray his intimate acquaintance with books. They, and his long walks, are his principal recreation.

Judge Lawlor was born in New York City, Sept. 17, 1854. He attended the public schools there for three years, the only formal schooling he has ever had excepting attendance upon night schools. When he was ten years old, his father and mother died within a few months of each other, leaving their five children to make their own way in the world. Judge Lawlor at once moved to Paterson, New Jersey, where he was employed as a bobbin boy in a cotton textile mill, carrying the spindles from floor to floor. An opportunity to better himself opened in office work in a neighboring coal yard, and he left the mills to take it. Later, the mills became a better field, and he returned as a yarn presser. For a time he worked in a silk factory, run by John Ryle, the first manufacturer of silk in the United States. During these years in Paterson, Judge Lawlor attended night school, and continued his studies at every opportunity.

At twenty-one years of age he came to California, and found work in the quicksilver mines at Oat Hill, in Napa county. From general work in the office he was promoted to be timekeeper and to take charge of the accounts of the company store. For a time he performed similar duties at the Aetna mines. In six years he had risen to be superintendent.

In 1886, Judge Lawlor resigned his position with the mining company and came to San Francisco to enter the practice of the law. He had read law while at the mines, and in San Francisco he continued these studies in the office of Rhodes & Barstow, a famous firm. Judge A. L. Rhodes, of this firm, was an associate justice of the Supreme Court of California from 1862 to 1879. After reading law for two years, Judge Lawlor was admitted to practice. In 1898, he was appointed by Governor Budd to fill out an unexpired term on the bench of the superior court in San Francisco; in 1900 he was elected to succeed himself for a full term, and in 1906 he was re-elected.

Right here it is worth while to point out an interesting contrast offered by the career of Judge Lawlor and the career of most judges. The usual course by which a man achieves a position on the bench is something like this: education, in grammar school, high school, college and law school; practice, some years before all the courts of his county and as attorney for many people; finally, election to the bench, where, as judge, he is called upon to decide cases presented by lawyers for or against men whom he may have appeared for or against, himself.

The experience of Judge Lawlor, on the other hand, has been more like the experience of judges in Germany. There a young man determines to study expressly for the purpose of being a judge, and not for the purpose of practicing at all. His training is different from the training for the bar. He never practices, and his whole experience tends to develop in him the impartial and judicial mind, as opposed to the habits of mind of the pleader of causes in search of a favorable verdict.

The intent of the German system happened to be practically worked out in Judge Lawlor's experience. His term of actual practice in the courts was very brief, and he appeared in court in relatively few cases. Most of his work was in the office, and there he made the reputation of having an extraordinary natural conception of the principles of justice. So, when Judge Lawlor went upon the bench, he had not had the years of experience in twisting the technicalities of the law to the necessities of clients that is one of the almost inevitable experiences of a practicing lawyer. He went on the bench with a native bent toward a judicial career, and with a mind not clouded with the cobwebs of technical expedients. He has been continuously on the bench since his first appointment. His development, therefore, has been free from the warping entanglements of the profession, both personal and mental, and has tended wholly toward the perfecting of the really judicial temper.

This point is important, and its results have been noticed by observers of Judge Lawlor's career. It has caused him to retain a flexibility and openness of mind to the spirit of the times that is notably lacking in many judges. It has caused him to keep fresh and clear his perception of the human side of the cases that are tried before him. And it has caused him constantly to keep uppermost in his rulings and decisions the broad view of the law that takes into account its prime purpose of doing justice. No decision from his court has ever used the refined technicalities of the law as an excuse for defeating the obvious purpose of all law.

Judge Lawlor's own conception of the method of procedure in his court is illuminating. In conversation with the writer he said:

"Whenever a case before me is fairly under way I begin carrying its elements, in my mind, back to the foundation sources of the law—to the federal and state constitutions and to the common law—to see what form it assumes when measured by these standards. After reviewing the case in the light of these fundamentals of the law, I pass over it again in the light of the statute law which modifies the details of cases in accordance with modern conditions."

This constant return to the sources of the law is a characteristic of Judge Lawlor's, noted by many who have never heard him enunciate it as a rule of procedure. It is a great force toward preserving a well-balanced sense of justice and a broad view of the application of the law to particular cases. In Judge Lawlor's case, at least, this does not imply ignorance of the statute law. On the contrary, his knowledge of the codes is remarkable; hundreds of times in the recent cases in his court it has been observed that he quoted the exact language of code provisions, from memory, adding the number of the section where the quotation would be found. Someone has likened his knowledge of the statutes to the feats of memory formerly performed by those Puritans who could quote the Bible entire, recalling the verse and chapter numbers of every phrase. The last thing that could possibly be said of Judge Lawlor is that he is no lawyer or that he does not know the law.

Returning to the human element in Judge Lawlor's decisions, it is noteworthy that he practiced the principle of probation of first offenders in his court long before that principle was incorporated into the statutes. The procedure in his court has always been very formal, but when the verdict in criminal cases is announced, Judge Lawlor always takes the prisoner in hand himself, and, without having him sworn, makes a searching but friendly examination. He tries to find out how the prisoner came to commit the crime, what the course of his life has been, whether he is an "accidental" criminal—there are many such—or whether he is a confirmed enemy of society. And in many cases decided by him before probation was recognized by the statutes, Judge Lawlor, by friendly admonition and suspension

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

We Clearer See

Tell me not, in your doleful way, that the world grows ever worse;
That we cannot escape from the drear old sway of the drear old primal curse;
Tell me not that there is no hope except in the grace of God,
For, though it be true, He sets that grace in the veriest human clod.
The world is sweeter than e'er it was; I read not far or deep
Till I know that out of the slough of sin the multitudes upward creep,
Our sight may be dim while we walk our time on this misty, earthly shore,
But we clearer see what the right must be than ever man saw before.

The world is better, aye, better far, than it was in the days of old,
When they might take who had the power and they might keep who held;
When the belted knights rode to and fro, their cruel will to do,
And the king was lord of his subject's brawn, and e'en of his spirit, too;
When a woman's name was a thing to toast and her honor a thing to own;
When a serf and a bondsman bore the mark of a tyrant upon the throne.
Ah, sigh if you will for "the good old days," the fabulous days of yore,
But we clearer see what the right must be than ever man saw before.

I know that the problems that vex us now are sore to our errant view,
But we've gained the sight, as we've gained the might, that our grandsires never knew;
We have swung from the day when might was right to the day when Right reveals
Some part of her face, divinely fair, to the veriest clod who feels;
Through the long, slow aeons we've upward pressed, as ever our God hath willed,
Till here has the Right been crowned our king, or there has the Wrong been stilled.
There is much to do, there is much to win, for the ages have taught their lore,
But we clearer see what the right must be than ever man saw before.

Selling Good For Evil

I suppose that Judas Iscariot did the most disastrous bit of financiering that has been done since the great Stage Manager rang up the curtain on the drama of life. And yet, if we pause to consider it, what did he more than men do daily? To be sure, he sold the best that touched his life for a sadly paltry price, but who is there among us who has not done the same thing ere now?

He sold his God for a few pieces of silver—what was the price that you asked? When you belittled your splendid womanhood for a place in Society, was that you received much better than thirty pieces of silver? When you traded your strong manhood for position, power, wealth or the lust of pleasure, do you not know, in saner moments, that you sold your God for that which, in the final account, is no better than petty silver? I have no extenuating word for Iscariot; I but contend that such bargain as he made we also have made. He did not realize that unnumbered generations would worship the One he sold, but he knew, as we know, that he sold the God within him for that which was comparatively worthless.

Judas went out and hanged himself; we still smile and try to appear as if we had done no wrong. I am not so certain that Iscariot deserves the execrations beyond all execrations of a race that never has ceased to sell that which is good for that which is evil.

Charity That Ends at Home

"He is very fond of charity, which, as he truthfully remarks, begins at home."

"How do you know?"

"Why, he is so fond of it that he keeps it there."

The Opinions of Rufus

If folks had to have licenses to play the fool I reckon we'd be 'stomished to notice how many of us would wear tags.

Middlin' often I've noticed that a tyrant in his own home is likely to be a mighty humble critter when he's out around among men.

'Bout the hardest lesson that life gives some men to learn is that it possibly may be them that's mistaken.

Es somebody remarked, the candle that's burned at both ends to once gives out the quickest, but it's more or less consolin' to reflect that it gives the most light, too.

I never noticed many fellers that paid off the mortgage on their homes by settin' round a grocery an' talkin' politics. P'raps they did, but I never noticed it.

I've heard p'litical orators that made me think of a parrot. I s'pose I ought to explain that this remark ain't intended for any reflection on the parrot.

Appearances are ruther deceitful. A mud-hen looks a good deal like a duck, but some fellers that have tried it say that its meat ain't nigh so satisfyin'—not nigh.

I've noticed that it's mighty hard to make a woman that's keepin' house fer a husband an' nine children dread the wrath to come very much. Some folks might consider this theolological weakness, but I look at it es somethin' else.

Their's nothin' in this world that's es ready to come when you invite it es trouble.

What the Man of Mars Saw

The Man of Mars was telling about his trip to the earth. "Once," he said, "an aeroplane ran into my etheroplane, and for a moment I feared it was all up with me but, fortunately—"

"That's all right," another Man of Mars interrupted, "but tell us about the people down there. Are they intellectual?"

"Sure! There appears to be no doubt of it."

"That's good! But what gave you the impression?"

"Why, some of them have so many and such superior brains that they have to drink stuff to reduce the quantity and quality of them. Their recognition of the sad necessity of thus reducing their brain capacity is really remarkable."

"Well, I'll be blessed!" said all the Martians, as with one voice. Then one of them asked:

"Do they recognize a supreme power—a God?"

"You bet they do!" was the response. "We people of Mars are not in it when it comes to recognition and worship of an Almighty. In all the affairs of life his name, as they speak it, is on their lips. You meet them on the street, and they talk about him; in their clubs he is the subject of conversation, and in their homes it is the same. He is remembered at the time of their birth, and when they are cold in death those who speak of them first of all inquire concerning their life relations with him."

"This is wonderful that you tell us," said an ancient Martian. "Do they give this much worshiped Almighty One a name?"

"Indeed they do," was the answer; "it is forever on their lips."

"What is this august name of the deity that is so dear to them?" the ancient Martian inquired.

"His name, always reverently spoken, the Man of Mars replied, "is Dollars. I could not fail to learn it, because I heard it so often spoken."

Then the Man of Mars explained that he had left his documents on the earth and would have to go back after them before he could prove he was there.

Others of the Kind

"Do you know, Slitz, the office-seeker?"

"I do."

"With what political party is he affiliated?"

"Well, if you will tell me which party is the most likely to win in the next election I will give you the information that you desire."

The Gentle Father's Lullaby

(The partner of his joys and sorrows being at the club.)

"Hush, my dear, lie still and slumber."

How the dear old lyric charms,

As the gentle father sings it

To the babe within his arms.

Softly rocking, gently rocking,

Soon the downy head shall nest

In the lovelight of his glances,

Safely sheltered on his breast.

"Hush, my dear, lie still and slumber.

Holy angels guard thy bed.

Heavenly blessings without number—

Mama won't be late, she said."

Loving lullabies, and tender,

Sung by fathers meek and mild,

How their melody remembered

Shall in future bless the child!

As might woo him angel anthems

From beyond life's misty deep,

So his gentle father's crooning

Shall, in dreams, lull him to sleep.

"Hush, my dear, lie still and slumber.

Holy angels guard thy bed—

Ma must read a special number,

But she won't be late, she said."

When He Proposes To Her

The manner in which man proposes marriage to woman has varied greatly during the slow creep of the ages. When Adam proposed to Eve it is recorded—but the writer does not recall by whom—that she looked long and yearningly about her; then she timidly said:

"Are you the only man?"

"I am," Adam responded.

"Sure that no other is concealed anywhere?"

"I am."

"Do you suppose that another may arrive before long?"

"I am confident that none will, darl—"

"Well, then, I—what did you say your name is?"

"Adam."

"Well, Adam, I—oh, this is so sudden—but I well—yes."

Then he drew her yielding form to him, and later they were married, and everybody knows how it turned out.

Poor Eve! She didn't have much of a show, did she? And that is where Adam had an advantage over his male descendants—she had to take him or trot alone, which would have been a dreary fate, and where would the rest of us be?

Since that quite-a-while-ago time the methods of proposing have varied widely. For instance, it formerly was the custom to propose to one's dear one by knocking her down with a club and dragging her away, but as women now vote in several of the states and are likely to vote in others, this custom has been discontinued.

Yet later it was the custom of the fond lover to drop upon his knees before his lady fair and implore her in impassioned accents to become his own, but as the floor frequently had not been swept and the price of trousers even then was increasing, this custom, too, gradually fell into disuse.

These are only two instances, but they illustrate how far man traveled before he reached the present stage, in which no rule applies except that he look as much like a chump as possible and trust to the woman's lack of judgment to cause her to accept him.

A Bit of Advice

If you've not a thing to say,

Drop it;

Words are wasted every day—

Stop it.

Though you'd like to prate and prate,

Guess you'd better hesitate.

If your word will nothing state,

Chop it.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Net Results Of the Swing Theodore Roosevelt has been undignified and improper. Instead of mounting a pedestal and assuming the statuesque pose of the greatest living has been he threw off his coat, rolled up his sleeves and waded into a "bully fight" just as though he were any other American citizen who has something to say and is able to command a crowd to hear him say it. Of course this was in very bad taste. Those who ask nothing, except to be left alone while they take to themselves the earth and the fullness thereof, profess themselves profoundly shocked. They feel that an American ex-President should retire to some cloister from which vantage of imperturbable irresponsibility he may utter cautionary ponderosities upon occasion.

But that is not Rooseveltian. He is militant. He does things, and he did a very great deal during his twenty days' swing about the Middle Western circle. He aroused the whole nation to a renewal of zeal for the square deal. He brought them back to a renewed consciousness of the indispensable quality of those elemental moralities without which nothing, and to the forgetting of which we owe all our present-day problems. And he aroused and arrayed in hostile panoply all the forces of reaction which must be overcome if progress is to be made.

The fight is on anew. Theodore Roosevelt precipitated it and must see it through or surrender. If he hesitate he will be lost. In vain may the President lift his hands high in air and cry out for peace. There is no peace and will be none until one side or other is vanquished.

What About This Newer Nationalism? There is no question that the American mind is profoundly stirred. Representatives of historically vested interests are pleased to call it hysterical and Theodore Roosevelt the apostle of hysteria. The Watchman doubts the symptom of hysteria. It would be truer to speak of it as a consciousness of being a living being and something more than an appendage to property. Mr. Roosevelt has spoken of the goal toward which this movement is reaching out as "The Newer Nationalism," whereat many timid souls shudder and say, "What is this newer nationalism? Are you very sure that it is a good thing? Ought we not to be very prudent and go very slow?"

Yes, indeed. We shall be more prudent than we need and we shall go slower than we ought even with Theodore Roosevelt to lead. Ninety millions of people are not to be started on the double-quick at the firing of a pistol.

The old nationalism placed property above man. The newer will place man above property. The old nationalism applied in theory the same principles of constitutional right to the owner of a peanut stand and the United States Steel Corporation or Standard Oil. The policeman told the peanut vender to move on, if it suited the disposition of him to do so, and the peanut vender had nothing for it but to comply, constitution or no constitution, police or no police. Now the newer nationalism recognizes that principles that apply well enough to individuals may apply ill enough to vast artificial persons aggregating hundreds of millions of invested capital. The newer nationalism would make the laws fit the fact rather than continue to have them based upon a theory that has little relation to the fact.

The Roosevelt Assault On the Supreme Court

The old nationalism assumed that courts, when about to render decisions, retired to the deserts to consider apart cold questions of fact and law unrelated to human passions, needs or aspirations and that, inasmuch as the Supreme Court of the United States has before it the great Standard Oil and Tobacco cases, it was highly improper for Colonel Roosevelt to disturb that court's tranquility of mind. No doubt he has jolted it. No doubt it needed jolting. Ninety millions of people will be helped or hindered by the decisions that court will render in these cases. It were a bad thing to have that court influenced in its decision by a popular wave of feeling, by anything akin to hysteria, but it would be a worse thing for that court to leave out of its decision all consideration for the rise of the common man, and the newer nationalism places the rise of the common man far above the prosperity of any one man or group of men. It cannot be a bad thing for that court to feel the influence of the spirit of the age and the country whether it be written into the record or not. The old nationalism also held inviolate the right of contract. The newer nationalism has said that a woman shall not contract away her power of motherhood, that children shall not contract away their childhood, and it may say that no man shall have the right to contract for a less wage than will yield him a livelihood. The old nationalism is of the legalist. The new nationalism is of the humanist. The old nationalism was founded upon property with the rights of man incident thereto. The newer nationalism is founded upon the rights of man with property rights incident thereto. Is it not good to be alive at such a time as this? Does not such an issue warm the heart and set the blood to pulsating? The vested interests say: "This is revolutionary." Well, they don't miss it much.

Crucial Test Of Roosevelt

There is no estimating the power of an unselfish patriotism. Nor is there any estimating the weakness of an over-vaunting ambition. The crucial test of Mr. Roosevelt's character is yet to be applied. The "interests" have declared that he is campaigning for the Republican presidential nomination for 1912. If such shall prove to be the fact he will fall as politically dead as a salted mackerel. He can be United States senator, governor, anything but president, but if he shall betray an overruling ambition it will be his undoing and to the serious injury of the movement toward a newer nationalism. He has said that whoever has been made president has placed himself under obligation to his country that never can be repaid, and if what he shall do be done only to be credited against that account he can do whatever ought to be done and not even the Morganheims can prevail against him. If our giant's feet be made of clay we shall know it in due season. He cannot conceal the fact, but until he shall betray himself The Watchman will continue to look upon Theodore Roosevelt as the nation's leader toward a newer and better nationalism.

Lorimer Incident The refusal of Theodore Roosevelt to attend a banquet at which Senator Lorimer was to be a guest struck home. It gave notice to the nation that it is no longer respectable to be indecent; that being under indictment, or connected with persons under indictment, is no badge entitling the wearer to the society of self-respecting men. Lorimer must first purge himself, not only of all taint, but if it be proven that his election was secured by the use of money he must resign his seat in the senate no matter who furnished the money.

And who can read of that incident without knowing as well as he wants to what would have taken place had President Roosevelt, instead of President Taft, chanced to be in San Francisco while the graft prosecutions were at their height! Is there any question that he would not have sat down to a banquet with half those under indictment baring their glistening shirtfronts to his indignant gaze? Not a bit of it. He would have warned them to go on the witness stand and purge themselves of all taint before venturing into the presence of the untainted. Such shocks are needed to keep alive the power to discern good from evil, to separate the reputable from the disreputable. He would have given us an object lesson worth 10,000 votes at the then ensuing city election.

From Down In Maine

While the Democrats won in Maine over a standpat, copper riveted, armor plated Republican machine, over which Senator Hale has lorded it as grand mogul, and by the defection of insurgent Republicans as a protest against standpatism, nevertheless it is not quite fair to say that this was the only revolt that helped the Democratic cause. There were other reasons why. Prohibition cut quite a figure, the resubmission issue being an important factor. Another was that the growth of taxation for a generation, no greater in Maine than elsewhere but there as well as elsewhere, made some impression on the general results. The clamor to "turn the rascals out and let us look at the books," after thirty years of unbroken Republican domination probably influenced some votes. Nevertheless, nothing short of a Republican revolt against the methods and the men of the old Republican regime could have induced the Republicans of Maine to fill the seat so long warmed by Eugene Hale with the "corporosity" of a Democrat. That was the unkindest cut of all. Now if some representative of labor could be elected to fill the seat of Aldrich the eternal fitness of things would stand completely vindicated. Those two austere personalities will make excellent stone posts for the newer nationalism to look back to once in a while just to see how far we have come since plutocracy was in flower.

Those Valiant Men Of Washington State

No more significant event of a most significant year has taken place than the sweeping victory of the insurgent cause in State of Washington. It was supposed that there, of all states, the gospel of conservation had fewest friends. It was in that commonwealth that schemes were chiefly hatched to annex to cunning promoters the wealth of Alaska. A purpose of the direct primary was to vindicate Richard Achilles Ballinger by "advising" the election of a standpat United States senator and by the nomination of standpat congressmen, and there is no question that all the influence that Ballinger and the administration could exert was brought to bear against Miles Poindexter and the insurgent candidates for congress. Nevertheless, the sweep of insurgency was almost clean and the vindication of Ballinger appears to have been certified to the historian of the future for further action. It is sun-up on a new era and old fogies are still snoozing unconscious of the fact.

The Empire State As a Battle Ground

The contests we have had in Maine, Washington, California, Kansas, and even in Wisconsin, are as skirmishes compared with the war that is being waged in New York. There the interests are entrenched as nowhere else, but there, also, Theodore Roosevelt is to be reckoned with. Wall street dreads him now as never before. His gospel of the new nationalism has created consternation in the world of high finance. Money by the million will be poured out, first, to prevent Theodore Roosevelt capturing the Republican organization in that state and, second, to defeat the ticket he and his friends may nominate if he does capture the convention. Give him the power to name the delegation to the next Republican national convention and the new nationalism for which he stands will be on the high road toward realization. The state convention will not be held at Saratoga until the 27th. From now until then there will be some tall scurrying all over the state. There is no patching up a truce. The direct primary is the immediate goal and that will mean the last of one-man power in the state of New York. It is true that Barnes of Albany is rather a small figure as a boss compared with the late Tom Platt and the odious Odell, but he has the interests behind him and they are big if he is not. Watch New York. That state is engaged in making history.

THE TAX-REFORM AMENDMENT

By CARL C. PLEHN

(Article No. 2)

In the issue of this journal, of September 9, 1910, appears an outline of the new system of taxation provided by Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 1. Before considering in detail the merits of the proposed system it is necessary to decide the question whether the present system is so bad that a radical change is necessary. The next article will deal with "Why these evils are as they are."

The present system of taxation comes in for condemnation the country over. In 1901 a committee of the California state senate reported: "From Maine to Texas and from California to Florida there is but one opinion as to the workings of the present system of taxation. That is, that it is inequitable, unfair and positively unjust." By way of proof of this assertion the Civic Federation of Chicago in 1907 published a summary of the recent reports of twenty special tax commissions in different states. The editor of this summary gives the "significant features" of these reports in the following language:

"(a) A general recognition of the necessity of adjusting tax systems to meet changing conditions.

"(b) The general property tax is denounced by a large majority of the commissions as primitive, ineffective, unadapted to present industrial conditions, and the greatest obstacle in the way of revenue reform.

"(c) Constitutional restrictions on revenue methods in most of the states are declared unnecessarily rigid and harmful; efforts are being made in many toward amendments.

"(d) The separation of the sources of state and local revenues is generally favored, and being widely adopted.

"(f) A recognition, all but unanimous, that all kinds of property cannot be properly taxed by the same methods; that classification of subjects of taxation is wise and equitable and sanctioned by the highest courts.

"(g) An increasing tendency to apply railroad and other corporation taxes (including those on franchise values), and license fees, to state purposes; these being assessed by state boards; leaving local assessments for county and municipal purposes."

As to California every one in the least familiar with the actual workings of the tax-system knows that there are glaring inequalities between man and man, between city and country, between county and county. Last year the state board of equalization raised the valuations of no less than eighteen counties by amounts ranging from 10 to 100 per cent. Even while doing this the board declared that it was beyond its powers to apply any really effective remedy to the known inequalities that exist.

Eighty per cent and over of the taxes fall on real estate alone. The farmer whose property is largely real estate and most of whose other property is visible and easily found pays far more than his just proportion. Public service corporations are generally undertaxed, although there are some very notable exceptions. Banks, except the savings banks, cannot be actually compelled to pay any taxes; what they do pay is nearly as much a free gift as their contributions to public festivals. But the savings banks are, as a rule, overtaxed. Franchises and many valuable privileges evade taxation. A corporation by the simple device of changing the record of its principal place of business can evade taxation on its franchise altogether.

Last, but not least, revenues that belong by right to the state at large are seized by certain localities advantageously situated and property located elsewhere is taxed to make good this loss. One county alone is drawing from the state treasury over $200,000 per annum more than she pays in. Yet all the counties are supposed to contribute to the support of the state institutions.

There are other evils, but these alone are sufficiently serious to be the cause for deep concern.

Los Angeles is to have a home for young women, to be built by William A. Clark, the copper magnate, formerly United States senator, as a memorial to his mother, Mary Andrews Clark. The home will cost $500,000.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor California Weekly:

As a subscriber I have read your publication and have recognized the fact that in your effort to win a political victory, you presented certain things from your own view point, but, as your candidate has secured the nomination for Governor and he will need the votes of all that he secured at the primary and some more, I am surprised to see you continue your attacks on President Taft.

Either you have deliberately misstated facts or have, through ignorance, done him an injustice. If the former, there is no hope that you will make any attempt to do Taft justice, if the latter then you owe it to yourself as well as Taft to do the square thing.

Furthermore, there are many who believe that Taft is just as reliable as any who ever held the office of President and when you assail him you only tend to lessen the strength of the Republican candidate.

As a Republican I am anxious for the success of the party. Simply because I could not have my way I am not out for "rule or ruin" policies. We must pull together. Continued unwarranted abuse will lessen the respect of your friends and certainly not win the esteem of those who have different ideas than those you advocate.

You are in a position to roast me for bringing this to your attention, but it don't warrant it. Play fair. Elect Johnson and if there be wrong methods pursued in the Republican party let men get together, discuss and correct them. Do the right thing. The bigger the man the more liberal and fair. Show that you are big.

W. W. COOLEY.

717 Market St., San Francisco, Cal., Sept. 3, 1910.

We have not the faintest desire to "roast" the author of the foregoing. On the contrary, we are greatly obliged to him for letting us know that the things we say have had the effect on his mind that they evidently have. We have never yet been able to foreknow just how anything that we say will strike the target it aims at. For instance, we have not the smallest idea of ever having "abused" President Taft in thought, word or deed. We have criticised him, but our faith in his integrity of character and single mindedness has never been shaken, though we here and now confess that he has disappointed us as President, and we fear that he will continue to do so to the end.

William Howard Taft is in the wrong pew. His place is on the supreme bench. He knew this better than anybody else and characteristically manifested his supreme weakness when he consented to be a candidate for president instead of going upon the bench as he wanted to. He knew his own capabilities better than Roosevelt or anyone else knew them. Ever and always he is the judge and not the executive and a judge he should have been and not an executive.

Which reminds that Lincoln Steffens gave the writer of this, and a few others, a true estimate of Taft more than a year before he became president. In substance, it was this: "He is naturally an indolent man, intellectually and physically. He loves ease and the easy way of dealing with problems. Give him a task and he will execute it splendidly, and then go away back and sit down until he is given another. He will fight when aroused, but he would rather be let alone."

This disposition has caused him to yield to pressure, first on one side and then on the other, with the not unlikely result that he will be the gladdest man in America when he can quit being president and go fishing, a loveable man, a safe judge but by nature unfitted to executive tasks in a nation throbbing with life and heart-hold to do and dare. If this is "abuse of the President," then we expect to abuse him some more. His own supreme yearning is, "For God's sake let us have peace, don't do anything disagreeable."

The particular fault our correspondent finds with us is with reference to our statement last week in "Political Table Talk," that the President is not in favor of a tariff commission, but prefers a tariff board. We made no mistake in that statement. The President did ask congress for a tariff commission, but the Payne-Aldrich influence cut it out of the bill and the President yielded. He then asked for a tariff board to advise him with reference to putting into operation the maximum and minimum features of the tariff law. This was given and he announced that he should hold that the scope of that board could be construed by him as broad enough to serve the uses of a commission, and asked for a further appropriation of $250,000 for the continuance of this work. Thereafter, in an address that the writer cannot lay his hands on at the moment, but that he remembers perfectly, the President expressed his preference for a board reporting to himself, and he to congress, rather than a tariff commission empowered to fix schedules and report directly to congress for the ratification of its action. The difference between the two, board and commission, is radical. Not all understand this. Those who drafted the tariff plank for the Republican platform here in San Francisco did not else they would not have said, "We therefore join with the President in demanding the appointment of a permanent tariff commission," etc. That is just exactly what he is not demanding. He pointed out, in the address referred to, that the plan had not worked well in Germany where it had been tried. If not it was because the Reichstag preferred to log-roll, as does the American congress. Congress has got to stop it.

The President yields to pressure. At the start pressure came from the wrong side and he yielded to it injuriously. It is now coming from the other side and he is yielding to it hopefully. He antagonized the insurgents at the instance of the regulars and sought to read La Follette and Cummins out of the party. At the instance of the insurgents he has thrown Cannon and Sherman on the junk heap, and has grown cold toward Aldrich. If, at the end, he finds himself on foot and alone between two fires it will not be because William Howard Taft is not an honest, wise, capable, loveable man, but because one whom God Almighty ordained to be a great judge the American people made an executive. Theodore should have stayed at home and looked after his man.

THE REVOLUTION IN PHYSICS

Ernest Rutherford did more, says a contributor to Current Literature, than solve the problem of the nature of matter. He proved that an element is forever transforming itself into some other element. Gold, to put the matter in simple words, is striving all the time to become some other thing than gold. It succeeds in the long run—perhaps in a million years, more or less. Therefore the alchemists of the Middle Ages were theoretically correct. There does occur a transmutation of elements. Rutherford did not merely theorize about that. He demonstrated the fact. The base metals do not transmute themselves into the precious ones. It is the other way. There is "a breaking down," as physicists say, of the precious into the base. Herein we have the net result of the upheaval and excitement in the realm of the physical sciences due to the discovery of radium, or rather, to be quite precise, to the discovery of that property of matter which is styled radio-activity. It is due to the genius of Ernest Rutherford alone that the world realizes at last the meaning of the spontaneous emission of radiations or rays capable of passing through plates of metal. Science stood at first bewildered by cathode rays, Roentgen rays, X-rays. The immortal Becquerel discovered that potassium uranyl sulphate emitted rays which acted on a photographic plate enveloped in black paper. The Curies analyzed systematically the mineral pitchblende and dumbfounded physicists by isolating radium with its incredible emanations. J. J. Thomson investigated the conductivity of electricity through gases and split the atom into smaller particles. But what did it all mean? The old chemistry was exploded. The physics of the 19th century stood discredited. Rutherford explained everything. The series of experiments through the medium of which Rutherford established the fact of the transformation of elements supplemented the investigation of J. J. Thomson into the conductivity of electricity through gases. Both breathed the breath of life into the conception of this universe as a mass of what, for want of a better term, we may call entities.

Madame Le Blanc, wife of Maurice Maeterlinck, recently acted the part of Melisande in her husband's play of "Pelleas et Melisande" at a private representation at the Chateau Saint Wandrille, where only twenty spectators were invited to follow the action of the piece by moonlight through the ancient castle.

MINISTERS' SALARIES

A bulletin just issued by the government gives facts about Christian ministers in American cities, their number and salaries, and about the mortgage debts of churches. The figures are for 1906, but have just been made public.

There were 164,830 Christian ministers and 1,084 Jewish rabbis in the United States in 1906, and they increase at the rate of nearly 4,000 a year. Their average salary is $663, and there was paid to them in 1906 a total of $69,667,587. Baptists and Methodists have more than half the whole number of ministers in the country, due to their large number of small churches, especially in rural districts.

In Manhattan and Brooklyn are several scores of ministers whose salaries exceed $5,000 a year. The highest salary ever offered a minister to preach in New York was $18,000 a year and a house, offered last year by the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, Manhattan—and declined! Several ministers receive $15,000 a year, and there are a dozen or more who get $12,000.

These salaries are the highest in the world. London and Berlin averages are hardly more than $3,000 a year. That is, a London minister who gets $3,000 is near the top. In New York he is near the bottom.

The government shows the average salaries of ministers in cities having 300,000 population and over to be: Baptist, $1,793; Congregational, $1,938; Methodist, $1,642; Presbyterian, $2,450; Protestant Episcopal, $1,873; Reformed, $1,938; Roman Catholic, $684, and Jewish, $1,491.

In the smaller cities and rural districts, ministers' salaries run away down. Baptists in the South average $334, and colored Baptists in the South $227. On the other hand in bodies that are strongest in the cities, like the Unitarian, the Protestant Episcopal, and the Roman Catholic, the averages stay about the same.

For example, Unitarians receive the highest average salaries of all, their figure being $1,653. The Protestant Episcopal ranges down from $1,873 to $1,517, the Roman Catholic does not fall off at all, the rural districts ranging higher than the average, at $724.

The average salaries of Christian Science readers is only $234 for the whole country, with $958 as the average in cities having 300,000 population or more. The government explains this curious fact as that readers are practitioners as a rule, and are expected to earn their own support.

In actual money, Methodist ministers get most of all, their salaries amounting annually to $16,150,000. Baptists receive $10,323,000, Presbyterians $7,610,000, Roman Catholics $6,779,000, Episcopalians $4,887,000, Congregationalists $4,154,000, Reformed $1,682,000 and Jews $801,000. Not all bodies reported, so these figures, in practically every instance, ought to be increased by one-fifth for 1906, and another fifth for the present year. It is estimated on the basis of these reports that in 1910 $100,000,000 will be paid in salaries, and that congregational expenses, missions and extensions will involve $300,000,000 more.

THE NON-PARTISAN JUDICIARY PROBLEM

THE LAW IN OTHER STATES AND A SUGGESTION FOR CALIFORNIA

By WILLIAM DENMAN

The short campaign for a non-partisan judicial ballot, inaugurated but two months before the last session of the legislature, found not only a very large majority of the incumbent judges, but the people of the state themselves, ready for the measure. In response to a few circular letters from the writer, over a hundred of the stronger newspapers throughout California gave active advocacy to the system. The subsequent approval of Judges Gilbert, Morrow and DeHaven of the United States bench and of Chief Justice Beatty and Justices Sloss, Shaw and Angelotti of the State Supreme Court gave the demand for the measure a weight and dignity which would seem to have made its passage certain.

The bill introduced by Senator Boynton passed the senate by a vote of 25 to 10, Senators Leavitt, Savage and Willis leading the opposition. The vote in the assembly was delayed till next to the last day of the session, when, with the active assistance of Young, Preston, Juilliard, Beatty and others, it received a plurality of the votes, but failed of a majority. The defeat in the assembly was due to the adverse efforts of Phil A. Stanton and Walter Leeds, of Los Angeles, and Milton Schmitt, of San Francisco. Grove L. Johnson also opposed the bill, but his efforts served only to solidify its supporters. The active opposition of Judge Curtis D. Wilbur of Los Angeles, then a known candidate for a partisan nomination for election to the Supreme bench, lent a certain kind of respectability to the adverse attitude of the Los Angeles delegation.

Defeat of Opponents

It is interesting to note that all these opponents of the measure have since received distinct expressions of public disapproval of their legislative attitude. Judge Wilbur's immature attack on the system as a "humbbug," although recommended by the strongest federal and local judges in the state, prejudiced him in the more northern counties where his kindly administration of the juvenile court was unknown, and his candidacy for the Supreme bench fell behind the other Lincoln-Roosevelt candidates even amongst the progressives of the party. Grove L. Johnson, who characterized the nonpartisan judge as a "spineless political cactus," was also defeated at the last election. So also were Leavitt, the race-track senator from Alameda, who could find no incumbent judge in California who had gotten his nomination by improper convention methods; Savage, of Los Angeles, who opposed the idea of non-partisanship on the bench as "new fangled"; Assemblyman Leeds, of Los Angeles, who said "we have a lot of good Republican judges in Los Angeles and, of course, we don't want to change," and Stanton, who gave all the power of the speakership in the assembly to prevent the passage of the bill. Schmitt by a narrow plurality in a large number of candidates received the Republican nomination, but his defeat by his Democratic opponent seems likely. With the exception of Wilbur, there was more than enough else objectionable in the legislative records of these men to cause this downfall, but the question of their vote on the non-partisan judicial ballot bill I am informed appeared again and again in their campaigns.

Law Passed in Other States

The proposed measure fared better in other states. The writer sent his circular letter to the governors and chief justices of the various states. The governor of North Dakota wrote that he had recommended adoption of the measure in his message to the legislature in the January following, and that a non-partisan judicial election law was enacted (Laws of North Dakota 1909, page 84). The chief justice of Montana wrote that he had turned the correspondence over to the judicial committee of the state senate with his personal endorsement of the plan. A similar law to that of North Dakota was passed at that session (Laws of Montana 1909, page 160). Nebraska enacted similar legislation at the same session of her legislature (Laws of Nebraska 1909, Ch. 53, page 256). Many other governors and chief justices responded favorably and no doubt the need of some such change is as keenly felt and will be as productive of results in those other states having the elective system.

The fight seems to be won in California, as both parties have non-partisan judicial elections planks in their platforms. The question now is, what kind of a judicial election law shall we enact? The bill proposed at the last session provided for a change merely in the ballot, which is the best we could hope for in the mass of legislation then presented for enactment. In the coming session, however, we may look for a law which will provide for a nomination as well as the election of all judicial officers.

Double Elections and Elimination of Lower Candidates

The Washington law of 1907, which was very loosely drawn, provided that all of the judicial candidates for the superior and supreme judgeships should appear on all the primary ballots and those receiving the highest vote equal in number to the vacancies to be filled should be printed on the ballot at the general election. This means that the judge was elected at the primaries and by a mere plurality, as it was impracticable to write in a sufficient number of new names on the final ballot to defeat a candidate whose name was printed. It is questionable whether the law was much of an improvement on the old system.

In Montana, North Dakota and Nebraska, the legislatures removed the judge from all consideration at the primaries and provided that he should be placed on the final ballot by petition only. At the general election a mere plurality of votes elects. This, though an improvement on the trading of the party convention system, still leaves the better qualified candidate open to defeat through the nomination of other well qualified persons, who, though without chance of election, divide his vote. By this means less desirable candidates often win by a small plurality, in a larger field of candidates where they could not possibly obtain a majority of votes.

Fortunately in California, where the question of non-partisanship in municipal elections has long been a subject of discussion and experiment by politicians, we have worked out a practicable scheme for electing the candidate of the majority of the voters. It is what is known as the Los Angeles plan, whereby the candidates obtaining the largest vote at the primary election, double the number of vacancies to be filled, become the only candidates whose names are printed on the ballot at the general election. The Berkeley charter has added an improvement whereby a vacancy is filled at the first election if any candidates secure a majority of the votes then cast. San Francisco will vote in November on another improvement, a simple method of rotating the candidates' names so that the lowest in the group alphabetically arranged will have the same chance with the lazy tops-of-the-column voter as each of his opponents.

Applied to the judicial elections, the modified Los Angeles plan would require that all the names of all the candidates for the judgeships should appear on the ballot of all the parties at the primary. This is also the first step in the Washington system. The votes on all of the ballots would then be totaled and if any judge received a majority of all the votes cast, he would be declared elected. For any vacancies not thus filled, double the number of candidates, from the top of the list, will be placed on the ballot at the general election.

By this process it becomes almost certain that one of the two men on the general ballot will be well qualified, as it is practically impossible to split the intelligent vote in such a way as to elect any two of the candidates of the special interests.

Place on Ballot

The judges' names should be grouped at the head of the left hand, or first column on the sheet, as provided by the bill presented at the last legislature. This is not because the office is more important than the governor's, though under our constitution it is not less so. It is because the judicial functions being the less conspicuous, bring the judicial candidates in less prominence before the voters and hence as a compensation they should be given a more prominent position on the ballot. No voter will fail to vote for the governor because his name comes after the judges. Many will fail to vote for the judges if their names are placed after the gubernatorial candidates. It is well both for the voter and the judges that the importance of the judicial office should not be overlooked.

Facility of Nomination

The Washington Act provided that any elector might become a judicial candidate on the payment of a small fee. The opponents of the measure raised the bugaboo of a deluge of candidates, but, as in England and in our California municipalities, the freedom of entry into candidacy produces fewer instead of more candidates than when three or four parties each nominate a full ticket. Even at the first election in Washington there were but eight candidates for the three vacancies on the supreme bench. Our experience in California has been that under the system of open candidacy there have been fewer candidates in the subsequent elections than at the first.

In any event the number of signers of the petition of the judicial candidate should be reduced to a minimum and he should be permitted to gather them at any place in the state where his judicial qualifications are recognized.

Rotation of Candidates' Names

The great disadvantage under which all candidates, judicial and others, labor, whose names are low in the alphabet, is an evil which is now well recognized. It can be overcome by a system of rotation of the candidates' names. Various experiments have been tried in other states, and the subject is of sufficient importance to be treated in a separate article. Sufficient to say that the non-partisan candidates will suffer even more from the evils of "top of the column" voting than those who have a party distinction to label them.

There can be no question that the best method of securing an able and impartial judiciary is by restoring the power of selection to the hands of a strong and independent governor. The appointment system is that in use in practically all the civilized countries of the world save the United States. Our fear of corporate control of our governors has led us to retain the elective system and it seems to the writer we have acted wisely. If, after a decade or two of experiment, the direct primary continues to supply us with such candidates as in this campaign, there is no doubt but that we will come to adopt the method of other civilized communities. However, as we may count on the continuance of the present system for some years, we should give our best energy between now and the session of the legislature to the solution of the problem of procuring an intelligent choice by the electors, free from considerations of partisanship. It is hoped that the above suggestions may at least serve to start the discussion.

SELMA LAGERLOF'S CAREER

One morning twenty years ago a school teacher living in a small country town in Sweden awoke to find herself famous. A story of hers, submitted in a competition offered by a Swedish magazine, had not only won the prize, but had received the enthusiastic congratulations of the entire board of judges.

She had been composing this story in her mind since her schoolgirl days, says the Woman's Home Companion, and it was such a simple, straightforward, compelling, yet romantic story of ideals that it took all the Scandinavian countries by storm.

It was the now famous story, "The Saga of Gosta Berling," the first in a series of remarkable books that finally won for Selma Lagerlof the Nobel prize for literature last year and made her one of the most eminent and interesting of modern authors.

In a subsequent account of how she came to write this romantic epic she tells us that once upon a time there was a story that yearned to be written to the world. So it went around from village to village and from house to house, knocking at each door until it came to her own humble cottage. She reverently determined to try.

She had absorbed as a child the naive, primitive folk talk of the country and being a born romanticist she thought that the greatest of all reality was the reality of the ancient legends of folklore. But romanticism was dead in these days and how could she bring it to life again?

Twenty years of brooding thought and labor taught her the lesson, and now at the age of 51 this charming spinster is known and loved throughout the whole Western world, not as the fortunate winner of the $40,000 prize but as a teller of fairy tales of that rare kind that may be read with equal pleasure by children and grown-ups. All the world now knows of the literary and ethical beauty of her stories and legends.

I WAS in the midst of a vast, level plain, across which the rising moon threw the shadow of myself and my horse in a prodigious black bar that stretched toward the westernmost point of the horizon, even, I fancied, up upon part of the impenetrable sky above. A more melancholy ride could not well be imagined. Whither I was bound I did not know. I could recall no farewell from my wife, only a space behind me as interminable as the immensity before me. I could not grasp even an intimation of a measurement of time nor space. How far I had come was mere guesswork; I conceived it only as an immeasurable distance. How far ahead my destination lay seemed equally unknown, it might be infinite indefinite spaces. I seemed suspended in a void: behind me nothing by which to gauge my progress from it, before me nothing by which to gauge my progress toward it. Those narrowing vistas of perspective behind and those widening perspectives ahead, by which the traveler notes his onward movement, were not existent. That I moved at all I was conscious only from the motion of my body as my horse's body rose and fell.

He, too, added to the unearthly attributes of my position. We had taken our way at a gentle lope, and he had maintained it without an instant's pause and without a perceptible diminution of his pace. He seemed tireless, a machinery of motion perfectly adjusted. Every hoof-beat sounded with the same methodical accuracy of the beat before, with the same force, after the same interval. Time and again I held my breath and strained my ears and nerves to detect a possible variation of his movements. There was none. As rhythmic as the motions of the stars, he bore me on.

I was inexpressibly weary. From the very start my limbs had yielded to a fatigue so utter that further weariness could not have made an impression on my brain. And yet, odd as I know it sounds to say it, I sat my saddle erect with ease, without a thought of falling or of calling my horse to halt. Onward I must continue, where or why I knew not, and yet "must" seemed not compulsion but a vague, though irresistible, impulse.

As the moon rose higher the outlines of the dreary scene about me came out in clearer lineaments, in those mystifying illusions of moonlight, those startling contrastings of brightness and shadow, those disturbing inequalities of vision. I perceived clearly now that where I rode was desert. Far as the eye could penetrate the ashen haze of moonlight, no tree nor house nor man appeared. I rode through a low forest of dead brush and grass, the highest stalk or twig rising no more than a foot above the ground, I, by comparison, a monster looming gigantic above them. All was gray. The moonlight shone with lifeless brilliance over the vast plain, and silvered the sky with a dead tint of light that robbed it of its lustrous blue.

I was conscious that a wind blew at my back. I could hear it, whispering, whispering, rising, falling, sighing. And yet not a blade of grass quivered at its touch, nor a bough of sage turned before it. One moment it was hot, and scorched me as if a furnace door had opened in the gates of this emptiness and poured a flood of molten air upon it. The next moment it was icy cold, and I shivered convulsively. Nevertheless, when it blew cold, I was still conscious that the desert where I rode was in a tropic land on a high and barren plateau.

Wave upon wave, a frightful sense of loneliness swept over me. Somehow I knew that no living thing before me had ever crossed this desert, that no man's habitation lay upon it, that until I left it I should see no sign of life nor hear anything but the rhythmic hoofbeats of my horse and the sound of the whispering wind. I strained my eyes to the horizon before and on either side, and saw only distance receding into greater distance and melting into the sky. I looked up at the sky above me, and saw only the dimmed stars and the cold face of the moon, and seemed to feel the heavens crushing down on me in soft, smothering folds of impalpable mist.

Still, I did not seem to be lost. There was no path to guide me, yet the way seemed perfectly clear. Straight forward, without hesitation or turning, my horse drove on in the night, and the reins rested idly in my hands.

Something was following me. Of a sudden I knew it, though I did not turn to see. I dared not turn. It made no sound, and it was at a great distance, but I was afraid. I knew that it was of the size and shape of a human being, but that its form was wreathed in a white mist, and only its eyes could ever be seen. It did not ride, and it did not walk, yet it advanced with an even motion, and slowly, the more terribly because so slowly, it gained upon me. I felt like a child in the dark, that has entered an unlighted chamber without fear, and, having turned to go back to the light, hurries panic stricken away from the shadow behind him.

I tried to picture the features of this mysterious shape that followed me. I saw it first as a death's head grinning, and with phosphorescent fires gleaming from its eyes. Again I pictured it as a wan woman, with flying hair and pallid lips.

At length I ventured to turn my head and beheld—nothing. Nothing but the same interminable waste behind me that stretched before me. But, though I saw nothing, I knew that it was there, silent, swift, and gaining upon me with excruciating slowness.

I tried to urge my horse to speedier flight. It was a vain effort, for so utter was my weariness that I could not move my limbs to spur him on, nor raise hand or voice to urge him. The beat of his hoofs continued as rhythmic as before.

As I gazed ahead, a black spot appeared in the distance, in a horizontal plane as if it were something laid upon the ground. At last my eyes had established a vanishing point, a perspective. Now I could see that I was moving forward. The spot grew larger, and, if such a thing could be, blacker as well. We drew nearer and nearer to it. And yet my spirits were not exalted. Rather they sank lower as I neared the margin of that ominous lake, for lake it proved to be as I drew near enough to discern its character. It was a black and stagnant pool, though pool does not describe it, for it shared the immensity of the whole scene, and spread in a vast, unbounded monotony, as far as the eye could follow. I was conscious now that we were descending a slope in the plain, a slope that grew steeper as we advanced. The rhythmic hoofbeats of the horse under me resounded with the same regularity, but his speed seemed unconsciously to quicken, faster and ever faster, until we were rushing toward the sullen sea at lightning speed. But not even a breath of wind blew in my face, though I still could hear it whispering beside me. Fear seized me, and I strove to turn the horse's head aside. Weariness again forbade me. Even my voice was still with utter weariness. And on we sped, straight toward that sullen sea. I could not turn my head, but still I knew that mystic shape in white pursued me. Terror followed me and death lay before me. And still we sped onward, straight toward that black, mysterious sea.

Which fear lay heaviest upon me I do not know. The terror of the man who walks in darkness, pursued by a silent, unseen shape, is the most exquisite of mortal terrors. Perhaps, as I weighed the fear behind and the destruction that lay before, I may have felt that that which lay before, promising oblivion and relief, was preferable to that which followed, mysteriously menacing. Still we sped onward.

Suddenly we were in the midst of that black sea. We were in the midst of it, but it did not touch us. On either side of us its waters lay, before us and behind, yet we were not tarred with its muddy touch. Like pitch those waters stretched away on either side, and at my left, glassed in its smooth surface, lay the cold reflection of the silvery moon. No ripple disturbed its image, no living thing moved in the depths to stir the waters. The desert had been as ashes of desolation; the sea was as the chilled lava of despair. Only the wind still whispered as before. My spirits sank lower and lower. And still the menacing presence followed, though I could not, for utter weariness, turn my eyes to look upon it. And still we sped onward.

And then the waters opened. Straight as the path of a moonbeam the way lay open before us, and the waters were rolled back as a bank of pitch on either side. And ahead, far ahead, I saw that the path divided, and one way turned to the left and the other to the right, and that no sign marked any difference in the paths. But as we drew near, the white figure that had followed me appeared at the parting of the ways, one arm upraised and pointing to the left hand road. My horse would have taken the right, and strove mightily to pass the figure, but, though the figure did not move, it barred the right hand path and forced him to the left. And then the figure disappeared, but I knew that it followed as before. And fear left me.

Suddenly we left the sea and began to ascend, without diminution of speed. As we ascended, my spirits rose. Our path lay toward the mountains. Soon the desert disappeared, and we were in a deep canyon, whose walls towered immeasurably high overhead. Darkness hedged me and shut off the light of the moon, but that darkness seemed brighter than the light. Soon even the trace of moonlight was gone, and utter darkness covered me. Still that darkness seemed brighter than the light. And still the shape in white followed me, close at my horse's heels, and fear was not with me.

Of a sudden we left the canyon, and my horse stood still. Weariness left me as a man drops his mantle, and I dismounted and moved slowly, for the darkness was profound. I turned again to remount, and my horse was gone. But as I turned my eyes were dazzled at a radiant shape, clad all in white. And now I could see it clearly, and its face was wholly beautiful and benign. And over its brow appeared a band of sparkling gems, curiously wrought into a mystic symbol, though I knew at once what the symbol meant. Its meaning was "Love."

As I gazed upon the band of sparkling gems the figure dissolved, and I was all alone. But a great light illuminated the place where I was. It was the light of the sun, the warm and glowing light of day. And the place where I stood was at the edge of a green valley, gemmed with flowers. The habitations of men appeared at a distance, and smoke arising from the chimneys. The sweet odor of morning filled my nostrils, and the cool dew wet my hands as I stooped to touch the flowers. A bird sang in the boughs of a tree nearby. My heart swelled with joy as it does in the clean strength of spring.

For a moment all was black. I reeled through a black infinitude of space, and then came peace. I opened my eyes, and at the bedside stood the physician, and, at his right hand, my wife. He smiled and murmured:

"He will live. Last night was the test. All he needs now is sleep."

And I saw that the face beneath the band of sparkling gems was the face of her who stood by my bedside, and that the dew that had touched my hands fell from her piteous eyes. And I smiled contentedly and closed my eyes in a deep sleep, in which was profound peace.

Mrs. W. H. Felton, widow of a congressman from Georgia, has just won her fight before the Georgia Railroad Commission, in which she pleaded her own case and was opposed by fifteen railroad attorneys. The railroad had received free a right of way on condition of establishing and maintaining a sidetrack on the Felton plantation. After the death of Congressman Felton this sidetrack was removed against the wish of Mrs. Felton.

of sentence, has turned erring men and women from the path toward hardened criminality into the paths of self-respect and useful citizenship.

Another example of Judge Lawlor's human and common-sense view of the law is his belief in the dignity and proper finality of the trial court's decisions in all but extraordinary cases. This belief was expressed by him in an address before the City Club of Los Angeles, last Saturday, and it must appeal to the sound reason of anybody who thinks of it, just as it has always appealed to the best judgment of the English people. The idea that substantial justice can best be done in the court in which all the facts are brought out from the oral testimony of the actual witnesses, under conditions that safeguard all the rights of the accused—a jury of his peers, a public hearing, the presumption of innocence—rather than by an appeal court which never sees any party to the cause and which concerns itself almost wholly with technical refinements in the procedure of the case, is an idea that seems elementary, and which has been discarded only in America, of all civilized countries.

Returning to Judge Lawlor's election to the bench, two matters are of interest. In the election of 1900, the four judges elected to the superior court received votes in the following order: Judge Coffey, Judge Lawlor, Judge Sloss, Judge Graham. In 1906, the election was more stirring. The fire had completely disorganized the life of the city, making it extremely difficult to do effective campaign work. Abe Ruef was in political control, and he fought Judge Lawlor viciously. Some of the reasons for Ruef's opposition came to light only after the election. Judge Lawlor had presided at the trial of some of Ruef's henchmen who had been caught committing election frauds, and had sent them to prison. He could naturally expect reprisals for this incident. But the real reason came out later. The crimes for which Ruef was afterwards indicted had been committed in May, and Ruef had reason to believe that he would be discovered. He also knew that if Judge Lawlor were to try the cases against him he would have only the usual protection offered by the law to all persons accused of crime. Hence the intentness with which he pursued his purpose of defeating Judge Lawlor.

In this campaign Ruef procured for Judge Lawlor's opponents, Edmund P. Mogan and Charles T. Conlan, the nominations of all three parties, Democratic, Republican and Union Labor. Judge Lawlor was able to secure only the Democratic nomination and the endorsement of the Bar Association. This fact was especially important at the time, because the voting machines were then in use, and it was difficult to explain to the voter how to scratch a ticket. If a Republican pulled down the lever to vote his whole ticket, Mogan and Conlan each got a vote, but Lawlor got none. If a Union Labor voter pulled the lever, Mogan and Conlan each got a vote, but Lawlor got none. If a Democrat pulled down the lever, Lawlor got one vote, but so did Mogan and Conlan. The only way a man could vote for Judge Lawlor and against the other two candidates was to pull down the Democratic lever, lift the pointers off the names of the other two and then release the lever.

Naturally, this was a difficult thing to make the voters understand, especially under the confused conditions in 1906. An added difficulty was the fact that Ruef had moved the registrar's office far out into the Mission, making registration extremely inconvenient for a large proportion of the voters. But, notwithstanding all these disadvantages, out of the 35,000 votes cast for judges of the superior court, Judge Lawlor received 21,000 and his opponents only 16,000 each.

Judge Lawlor's record on the bench since 1906 is too well known to be reviewed here except in the most general way. It is well to recall that the attorneys for the defense in the graft cases, month after month, used every conceivable means to trap the judge into errors of ruling, to so harass him as to make him seem to take sides against the accused, to wear down his patience and his strength so that he would turn the cases over to another department for trial, and that the judge, through it all, maintained his composure, preserved his judicial temper, and kept his rulings free from bias. To conceive the strain that he has gone through during the last four years would tax the holdest imagination. He has been the target for the bitterest hatred, the most unscrupulous and libelous newspaper attacks, and the object of an organized conspiracy to wreck his life, both mentally, nervously, socially and as a judge. That he has come out of that ordeal in sound health and without a trace of unstrung nerves, is a wonderful tribute to his physical powers and to the resources of fortitude in his spirit. That he has come out of it with general recognition of the fairness of his course upon the bench is an even more extraordinary tribute to his qualifications as a lawyer and a judge.

To sum up Judge Lawlor briefly, he is a man—a big man. He knows his business—the law—he knows life, he has been tried as in a furnace in the fires of temptation and the fires of hate, and he has come out unsmirched and unscathed, a quiet, resolute, self-controlled gentleman, unembittered and a judge profoundly respected for his learning and integrity.

Miss Kate M. Gordon is the leader in the movement to have the women of New Orleans vote on the question of holding a Panama exposition in that city. By law all taxpayers are entitled to vote on questions involving taxation. As a majority of the taxpayers of New Orleans are women and as the exposition would make it necessary to levy a tax, Miss Gordon contends that it rests with the women of the city to decide whether or no the exposition shall be held. Miss Gordon, as the leader of the Women's Sewerage and Drainage League of New Orleans, is credited with having won the fight for the new drainage and pure water system put in a few years ago.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The State Printing Office

The State of California is a great consumer of printer's ink and paper, no doubt the greatest, except the railroads, within the state. The state prints the greater part of the text books used in the public schools, all the offices get out at least biennial reports that are printed for distribution to those who take an interest in public affairs and the state offices use no end of stationery and blank books in correspondence and accounting. Taken all together the business is very large every year, but, during the years in which the biennial reports have to be gotten out, and especially when the legislature meets, a great amount of printing is done.

The writer has not available the figures for state printing since the fifty-eighth and fifty-ninth fiscal years, the years ending June 30, 1907, and June 30, 1908. The reports for later years will not be out until about the first of January or, anyhow, not until along toward the end of this year. However, the reports for these two years are fairly typical.

The legislative session for 1907 ran up printing bills at the state printing office amounting to $84,880.43, for printing and reprinting bills before the legislature, journals and proceedings, stationery and whatever else was wanted. It all has to be done under rush orders, the printing office is running night and day while the legislature is in session and as many as 350 hands are frequently employed in the office.

When the legislature makes an appropriation to carry on the several state institutions and departments of service it usually stipulates a certain sum that can be expended for printing, but requires that the printing shall be done by the state printer at such rates as he finds it necessary to impose in order to make the printing office pay its way out of these appropriations. There are about seventy such consumers of printing aside from the legislature. For the fifty-eighth year these departments expended all together $103,939.64 for printing. For that year the total payroll of the state printing office, not counting the text book department, amounted to $122,412.30 and the entire expense, other than for school book account, was $185,232.52.

The fifty-ninth fiscal year had only a two or three day's extra session of the legislature and so the printing bill ran up to only $3,105.75 for the legislature that year, and the total expenditures of the State Printing office, outside the text-book business, were only $88,718.45.

The text-book business requires a large capital and furnishes steady employment for a good many workers. During the fifty-eighth year there were printed 440,030 school books, but that wasn't a good year for text-books. The fifty-ninth year showed a printing of 1,266,519 school books. The payroll for that department for the year averaged over $5,000 per month or $62,553.70 for the year; the paper used cost $42,940.04; binder's board, $2,222.15; binder's cloth $7,536.60, and the total expenditures were $130,585.65 for that department that year.

But the state gets its money back on the text books, for, during the fifty-seventh year, it sold to the school children of California, 450,607 books for $184,434.82; during the fifty-eighth year 538,437, which brought $214,758.04; during the fifty-ninth, 534,088, which yielded $179,870.68.

The text-book capitalization, furnished by the state some years ago, is what is known as a "revolving fund." Most moneys have to be paid into the state treasury and cannot be paid out again until appropriated by act of the legislature, but the money received for text-books is paid out as the printing office needs it for printing more text-books without special appropriation.

To do all this printing the state has quite a printing plant at Sacramento on the capitol grounds. The building is an old one, not very well suited to the purpose, but the legislature is little disposed to construct a new one, although asked for by the state printer at every session. An inventory of the contents of the printing office made in 1907, disclosed a value, including stock on hand, amounting to $311,192.27 and a good deal of new machinery is bought from time to time to take the place of the old or to meet new requirements. State Printer Shannon will ask the next legislature for three additional Mergenthaler typesetting machines, and for four Miehle presses, the latter to take the places of old ones.

The criticism made of the State Printing office is that printing costs, when done by the state, from one-half more to twice as much as it could be done for in the open market—if the state could maintain an open market for doing printing, but experience has shown, in this and other states, that it is very difficult for a state to get a square deal in having public printing done no matter how it is done. Bidders conclude on the one hand and, on the other, a state printing shop tends to be filled by persons who cannot hold jobs anywhere else. Every legislator feels that he must find a place for one or more printers in the state printing office and such help is generally costly at any price. A merit system might solve the difficulty.

The Superintendent of State Printing is elected by the people, although he ought not to be. The people of the state cannot determine who is fit and who is not. The governor should select the man and be responsible to the people for him.

His salary is $5,000 a year and, in the present case his wife is his deputy and draws $2,400 more, making the office a profitable one to hold. There is no department of state government that more certainly needs being put upon a strictly business basis than the state printing office.

WHERE ABRAHAM FISHED

Mrs. Victoria de Bunsen in "The Soul of a Turk" relates a legend concerning Abraham which will be new to many readers, says the London Globe. She learned of it while at Edessa, the traditional Ur of the Chaldees. She was shown there a large oblong tank of water so filled with fishes resting just below the surface of the water that their fins and backs seemed almost wedged together so as to form "an almost solid layer of silvery life."

"The guardian of the mosque throws some meal into the water and the fish jump high to catch it, a great living pyramid, of which those who jump the highest form the pinnacle. The tradition is that Abraham, as a child, fished in the tank. Hence the fish were considered sacred. No single one has ever been caught or killed to this day. Indeed, death would overtake the man who transgressed this law."

By Way of Amendment

LAST WEEK THIS PAPER SAID, "More deaths, undesired and tragic, are due to automobiles than to railroads, street cars, the equine species, tornadoes and lightnings combined," to which a reader replies, "If all your statements are as far from the facts as this you'll soon have the dailies beaten," which moves us to amend by inserting the aviators also. Seriously, though, there are no statistics to depend upon, but enough is known to justify the statement that the automobiles maim and kill more people than the railroads, destructive as they are of life, and to emphasize the necessity for strict supervision and training of all who undertake to operate those machines. The havoc they have wrought is fearful.

Which Showed Blood?

THAT TSAI HSUN UPHELD the prestige of the Flowery Kingdom while in San Francisco by scattering royal largess far and wide cannot be questioned. He proved himself a game spender. It may be noted that the country he comes from is one of the poorest on earth and that every tael he threw to a lackey cost, in its earning, some subject of the youthful emperor bloody sweat. Munificent opulence astride the back of misery without hope is not edifying. When Benjamin Harrison visited San Francisco he gave the hotel porter seventy-five cents. Tsai Hsun left $150 to be distributed among the hotel's servants. Which showed blood?

Lorimer's Vindication Feast

IT IS REPORTED from Chicago that Senator Lorimer is to be tendered a vindication luncheon by those who resent the cold cut given him by Colonel Roosevelt. Nothing could be more appropriate provided that the characters of the guests fit the quality of the occasion. Such an event would but poorly furnish forth the needful vindication without the presence of Calhoun, Schmitz and Ruef, of San Francisco; Clark of Montana, who knows how it is himself; the indicted Chicago packers and such St. Louis boodlers as made shift to beat the law. Perhaps Pittsburg might spare a fitting few if their terms have expired. Let nothing be left undone to make the personnel fit the event!

Glad Days

TOM WILLIAMS HAS TESTED the issue and he knows. A way has been found for beating the anti-racetrack gambling law that California was at so much pains to enact, and a great season of prosperity is looked for at Emeryville. The law prohibited bookmaking, but if books can be made without books, and Tom Williams says they can, what can the courts do about it? They can do this: They can hold that bookmaking is bookmaking however the books are made and so go straight to the substance of the evil rather than potter over the form. And they ought to! Mr. Williams is betting that they will not. Whose faith in the courts is strong enough to warrant calling his bluff?

Previous Good Character

CHARLES R. HEIKE was and is an exemplary gentleman. C pious, well behaved, temperate, soft spoken, conqueror of himself, as fine a model of probity as Addicks of Delaware, better known as the "unspeakable Addicks," who was without spot or blemish, as also is Lorimer, the unfit to sit at meat with gentlemen. They are of the number of those who have no vices and mighty few virtues, a species of the genus homo not unknown in all climes and times. Heike stole for the sugar trust two or more millions from his country, and a merciful judge, who should have shared his penance with him, sentenced Heike to eight long, dreary calendar months in jail and to pay a fine of $5,000. Did not the blind goddess yearn for a hatchet when that sentence was pronounced? Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per month! The common misdemeanant works out his penance at $2 per day. Why not Heike?

The Lid

CHIEF MARTIN REGARDS Mayor McCarthy as an unknown quantity. Well he may. Whatever McCarthy does he will undo and whatever he does not that will he do. Chief Martin complains also that he was ordered to take the lid off and now his head is going off because he took the lid off. This is all very true, but not so absorbingly interesting as to justify the public taking their eyes off the Halsey case for a single minute. Watch that case! The sincerity of the administration and Fickert is on trial there, not in the new tenderloin.

The Pork Barrel

THE JUDICIAL UTTERANCES of the President in relation to the Pork Barrel are eminently sound, as sound as were his Des Moines utterances in relation to the railroad regulation law; but will the President content himself with impartial utterances or will he expectorate in his broad right palm, reach for the big stick and say: "Here, you fellows, quit your foolishness and get busy on the lines I have laid down. Not that the executive desires to trench upon the peculiar province of the legislative department. Far from it, but what I want to know is, do you gentlemen see this cudgel?" That will produce consequences, invaluable to the state. Amiable and unobjectionable conversation is unlikely to.

Nothing New

THE PRONOUNCEMENTS OF ROOSEVELT contain nothing new." The charge is sustained. It is one of the limitations of sound morals that they lack piquancy. But was it not a bit new to refuse to eat with a senatorial corruptionist? New to challenge to combat the greatest political machine in the greatest political state in the union? Was it not new to put aside a third term in the presidency that could have been had for the consenting? After all, isn't the career of this man Roosevelt about the newest thing in human history?

Western Conservation

NOTICE HAS BEEN SERVED that, at the American Mining Congress to be opened at Los Angeles Monday, resolutions will be adopted setting forth a distinctly western view of conservation, a view that may startle the theorists of the over-enthusiastic East, a view practical, such a view as best fits the needs of that part of our common country that is to be conserved. Will this "western conservation" be for public benefit or for private? Will it first go through the centrifugal separator and be skimmed of the unearned increment or go straight to the public use, butter fat and all? A waiting nation is curious to know. At all events let us hope that it will not be akin to that conservation of Indian mineral lands, for the benefit of a close corporation of swindlers, to which an Oklahoma witness testified, and then apologetically protested to an eastern senator, "We western men do not look at these things as you do in the East. We are practical."

The Meaning Of It

All over the nation men are turning to each other and asking, "What is the meaning of this unrest among the people? Are they not prosperous? Why are they, therefore, not content?"

Various are the answers given. Some say, "It is one of those distempers that sweep over the nation periodically. Don't mind it. It will pass." Others say, "It is populism risen from the dead." Others that, "Those scoundrelly demagogues are at their old tricks again. They are out and want in." Yet others, "The Lion Hunter is at the bottom of it."

None of these answers is satisfying. Distempers do not sweep over a nation without provocation. Populism was born of adversity. It owed its existence to six successive seasons of deficient rainfall from the Mississippi to the Rocky Mountains and from the Canadian to the Mexican line. This upheaval among the people, from Maine to California and from Canada to the gulf, comes in a period of almost unexampled prosperity. The demagogues we have always with us and they are not at their old tricks again. They are always at them. The upheaval began to manifest itself at a time when the Lion Hunter was in darkest Africa.

May The California Weekly venture to interpret the signs of these times and so assign the cause?

If we may stick a peg at an initial point we shall place it at the rise of Mark Hanna to supremacy in Republican counsels and his mortgaging the Republican party to special interests for the saving of the nation from the insanity of free coinage. He made government by checkbook recognized and regular. The exigency deserved almost any means needful to the end. Our adoption of free coinage would have staggered the world. The mortgagees had well-nigh foreclosed on the party when a fortuitous circumstance brought Theodore Roosevelt into the presidential office. Roosevelt spent three 'prentice years in learning how to be president, in learning in what interest and by whom our nation was, in fact, not theory, being governed.

He took the nation into his confidence and laid its bosom bare that the wounds inflicted by Shylock in obtaining his pound of flesh might be visible to the world. The people saw with consternation that government by an incorporated plutocracy had supplanted government by the people, but they had pinned their faith to Theodore Roosevelt, believing that he would, with their support, retrieve that which was lost and restore that which had been taken away. When Mr. Roosevelt waved the task aside and pointed to one William Howard Taft as a fit person to finish what he had begun, the American people took Taft at his word and rested content that the big, generous-minded, kindly-disposed Ohioan should complete the unfinished task.

The new President sent to the senate the names of his cabinet, and the American people, rubbing their eyes to make sure that they saw aright, found that cabinet made up of attorneys of special interests, acceptable to the special interests, scarcely one of whom gave entire satisfaction to the public. That made the American people sit up.

Then the President made his chief advisers Aldrich and Hale, Elkins and Cabot Lodge, and the American people began to take notice. There followed the greatest bargain-counter tariff-making exposition the world had ever seen, in which the efficiency of the steam roller and hydraulic compress in action staggered the reasons of men. For the first time the American people saw who their masters were and with what tyranny they were to be governed. "Cannonism" was rampant.

Then followed the presidential swing around the circle, beginning with a laudation of Aldrich, continuing with a justification of the unjustifiable tariff, made memorable by sitting down, without protest, with confessed grafters in San Francisco, the Pinchot-Ballinger incident, returning to Washington to present the Roosevelt policies in carefully drafted bills for the consideration of congress, a bug in every bill, every measure a device to effect a seeming redemption of pledges with an actual betrayal to the plutocratic oligarchy, the cunning work of Wickersham. These are hard things to say, but they are true, although a magnanimous American sentiment has attributed the situation, with entire truth no doubt, to an overmastering pressure brought to bear upon the President rather than to a betrayal upon his part of the confidence that had been reposed in him. They have pronounced him an efficient subordinate, but a disappointing chief.

"What, then, means this national upheaval?" Just this: The American republic is rapidly coming to be a republic in name only, the shadow without the substance. An insatiate money-hunger has assumed to govern by checkbook in the interests of a few vaster aggregations of capital than the world had dared to dream of. The ideals of the people are being debased and their morals subverted by a gross materialism. Once again, the national life is in danger and if government by the people is not to perish from the earth men must fight to retain it, fight without asking or giving quarter, fight until not one malefactor of great wealth will dare dispute the supremacy of the popular will.

That is what means this mighty upheaval. The Lion Hunter has returned. He has voiced what is in the hearts of the people better than they themselves can voice their own feelings, give tongue to their own cry. It is one of the most splendid awakenings in human history. It is good to be here. It is magnificent to be alive at such a time. It is glorious to bear a part, be it never so humble, in such a splendid struggle for the common good of mankind. Men had feared that the greatest experiment in government in the history of the world was about to fail. The doubtful are being cheered, the despondent are taking heart. California calls to Maine and New Hampshire to Iowa as they called in '61, and, from ocean to ocean and lakes to gulf, the answer is, "We are with you once again." That, men and brethren, is the meaning of it.

The Political Judge

Free government is put to its highest test in the constitution of its judiciary. There is need for clear thinking and sound reasoning on the subject. Fundamentally, the public will get no more from its judiciary than it will have or know the reason why, and it should tolerate no less than that without knowing the reason why. What is that judicial standard without which nothing?

That the judicial candidate shall owe nothing to any special interest, any local boss, any partisan organization. Whoever, sitting on the bench, looks into the eyes of another and there reads: "I made you a judge. But for me you would not occupy your present exalted position. Therefore, if you do not remember who made you whenever your maker or his friends have causes in your court you are an ingrate and merit political punishment"—whoever reads such a message in the eyes of another and does not spurn it with scorn is less than a free man and is unfit to occupy any judicial position.

Now where judges come to the bench through election men must vote for them or they cannot get elected, their friends must champion their cause or the voters will not be aware of their existence. They must go about and be seen of men else voters are deprived of at least a qualifying opportunity to judge of fitness. Otherwise the voter votes for a name rather than for a man. Hence it follows that a candidate for judicial honors cannot be a mere onlooker, a non-combatant, a statue on a pedestal. It is honorable to desire judicial preferment and it is not dishonorable for a judicial candidate to desire to make friends. Where then shall the line be drawn that differentiates the political judge from the non-political?

It is not easy to draw that line. There are men now on our appellate bench who got there by making overtures to the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. They should be cast into outer darkness at the first opportunity. There are men there who got their positions by trading the votes of the delegations from their counties for anything offered in exchange for votes for a judicial position. That is ignoble and any judge who will stoop to it should be respected as little as he has respected himself.

There are men on our appellate bench in this state who got there through entering into the game of politics, county, city and state, and playing the game for all it could be made worth according to the rules of the game. Such judges, at the crucial moment, are likely to remember who made them judges, and in ways that will make it profitable to their makers to have made them. Than such as these there are no more dangerous men in human society and the elevation of such men to the bench by popular election will do more to discredit free institutions than any other misfortune that can befall. They are political judges and the political judge is a menace to justice.

But for a judge to be ambitious to rise in the judicial scale, for him to ask and receive the support of his friends, become acquainted with the people, show himself at their meetings, is not to disqualify him, and yet, in the final analysis, the record he has made as a judge and the characters of those who approve and disapprove of him, these must be the determining factors in his election or defeat.

What Of It?

Many minds are concerned to know whether the next house of representatives is to be Republican or Democratic. That is not the paramount issue. The real issue is, is that house to be progressive or retrogressive, insurgent or reactionary, for government by the people or for government by checkbook, government for the people or government for the special interests? Wherever the Republican candidate is in possession of the incorporated plutocracy and the Democratic candidate is not every God-fearing Republican will pray to Almighty God to deliver the victory into the hands of the Democrat. Wherever the Democratic candidate is in the control of the interests and the Republican candidate is not then should the prayers of free Democrats ascend to heaven, and their votes go into the ballot box, for the victory of the Republican candidate in that district. Where the issue is resolved to such a choice in any congressional district, as in the fourth congressional district of California, for instance, where the victory should go to the candidate who is free and not to the one under bond, to a Macarthur and not to a Kahn. Never in all our history has party been entitled to count for so little, and freedom from bondage to special interests for so much. Where, as in California and New Hampshire, progressive Republicanism has triumphed over reaction and corporation domination, it becomes the duty of every lover of liberty to enlist in the progressive cause and help to make that cause triumphant. No such calamity could befall the country as to have progressive Republicanism beaten in California and New Hampshire, Wisconsin and Washington, Minnesota and Michigan.

The Sinews

The indifference of the citizen is the body of death chained to the ankle of liberty. The human mass is inert. It takes a great deal to arouse it to action. Perhaps the time may come when something more urgent than moral suasion may be applied to the voting constituency of a state to induce it to turn out and perform the functions of citizenship, but until something more potent is applied the persuasion of the many must be the burden of the few. That costs money. It costs money to carry on a successful propaganda for any cause if it is to cover a state as large as California. In short it costs money to conduct a political campaign. Whoever bears that cost is likely to claim a benefit commensurate with his contribution. If the books of the Southern Pacific Company could be opened to public scrutiny, and the truth made plain, the people of California would be astounded both at the cost of government to that company and its profits on the investment. The accounts would be in terms of millions. The present Republican State Committee has not that resource. It has wisely limited the contribution from any person to one thousand dollars. A wealthy man may contribute that much without assuming to own the state government, but such contributions will not be numerous. The need is for several thousand $10 contributions. That will give The People an unprecedented claim upon successful candidates for efficient service for The People. Heretofore the experience of candidates has been that each voter has wanted something from each candidate rather than to contribute to carrying the load for making a campaign. As The California Weekly views the situation no greater misfortune could befall the spirit of progress and political Right Things than to have Hiram Johnson and the Republican state ticket, in the main, fail of being sustained by the voters in the November election. Such a result would be accepted the country over as proof of the hopelessly subservient condition of the Republican party in California. But no winning fight can be made without money with which to make it and money can come only through free-will offerings, not from the very rich, whose sympathies are like enough to lean another way, but from those middle class citizens for whose benefit the existing war for Right Things is being waged. Any contribution sent to Adolph Uhl, 717 Market street, San Francisco, will be receipted for promptly and with sincere appreciation.

The Line of Advance

Women are people. Government by, of and for The People comprehends government by, of and for women. Women cannot be left out of the equation. They are not left out of it. Since government was women have had a hand in it, sometimes as queens, sometimes as mistresses of kings, sometimes as ladies shining at court, sometimes as entertainers in their own salons, often as participants in campaigns of education. In America, always as listeners to political addresses and as persons who employ their personal influence for what it is worth for political ends. It is useless to talk of excluding women from participation in government. They never have been excluded from it and never can be.

But shall they vote? The Republican party of California has promised them that they shall have that issue put up to the men of California for a rehearing and, in preparation for that rehearing, the California Equal Suffrage League is to hold a state conference at the Palace Hotel in San Francisco on the 30th of this month.

The issue is not one to be lightly determined. It is not one to be determined by deductive reasoning. It is not an issue of natural right. The sole question is, What is best for the state, for human society, the progress of the race? If the well-being of society needs the votes of women it must have them, it should have them no matter how great the burden inflicted upon women, and that that burden will not be slight every man who performs his civic duties in good conscience and with diligence can assure them. It is no easy yoke to bear. It costs time, money, nerve force, patience, friendships, a never-ending resistance to evil persons and tendencies. It is war, and war is—well, General Sherman knew, and dissent has never been registered against his definition.

This paper believes in equal suffrage and doubts not that it will some time come, but it dreads the doubling of the inert voting constituency of the state to be pleaded with, appealed to and scolded in the hope of inducing it to perform its civic duty. The task is now almost greater than the relatively few devoted spirits are able to perform. Will doubling the mass double the leaven that must work within that mass? Frankly, we don't know. It is a question for sound judgment to determine.

We could wish that the goal of equal suffrage might be come at by easy stages and hand in hand with such restrictions as will limit all suffrage to those who have made themselves fit to be electors. Suffrage should be something to be achieved, open to all, except to the unfit while they are unfit.

However, these are issues for the California Equal Suffrage League to consider.

Justice M. C. Sloss

Elsewhere in this paper will be found an appreciation of M. C. Sloss, justice of the Supreme Court of California and candidate before the people to succeed himself. We favor his election. We do this notwithstanding his participation in the unfortunate Schmitz decision wherein we think that the court erred in following the letter rather than the spirit of the law. We cannot at once break wholly away from time-honored rules of construction, but we recognize in Justice Sloss a man of liberal mind, of breadth of view, of fine mental powers and young enough in years to keep step with human progress toward a freer spirit on the part of the judiciary. He is no reactionary. The faces of the people, here and everywhere, are set toward emancipation from the letter that the spirit of justice may have freer course in the minds of judges. Justice Sloss is of progressive temperament. He will keep up. His intelligence is keen. He came by preferment, in the first instance by appointment, and he owes nothing to any special interest. The taint of corporation designation does not attach to him. If he was nominated at Santa Cruz it was because it would have been suicidal for the "organization" manipulators to have traded him off. He is progressive. His attitude of mind is healthful. He worships at the shrine of no fetiche. He should be preferred to any of his competitors except Judge Lawlor, whose should be the first name stamped on every man's ticket.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

That, "as a man thinketh so is he," is as true as gospel preaching no one will deny, but it is not truer than that as a man thinketh not so is he. Who, that has been striving to make society better than it is, has not many times asked himself if those against whom he must wage war are possessed of devils, if they are not actuated by the spirit of malignancy, if they really hate their kind and would inflict injury upon them if they could?

There are bitter souls that would inflict pain and work injury for lust of ill will, but they are few and mainly behind bars already, morbid souls so distempered as to be restrained of their liberty. The great workers in iniquity are not these. Problems of evil in the social order were easily solved if diabolism, open, frank diabolism, were the only social enemy. No, our enemy is not he of the cloven hoof. It is he who thinks not, regards not, cares not, for as a man thinketh not, so is he.

It was prophesied that men should think that they are doing God service in putting to death the disciples of The Christ and the prophecy was fulfilled, and, today, those elements in our social order against whom unceasing conflict must be waged have either persuaded themselves that what they do is a real human service or else they have thought not at all.

Are the Rockefellers, Morgans and Guggenheims trying to injure their kind and to inflict great wrongs upon the nation that has made them possible? Not so. Either they have persuaded themselves that it is best for all that the wealth of all be confined to the care of a few great, executive stewards for the people, and that the "oligarchy" is the best "archy" for all the people or else they have thought not at all.

Workers in iniquity are seldom "onto their jobs," as the street would express it, seldom conscious of being in the business of producing iniquity. They are merely attaining the ends in sight and are not considering consequences not to themselves alone. Often they are not considering even their own well-being, but are following inclination and inclination is absence of thought.

But shall we excuse these workers in iniquity because they proceed without malice prepense? Perhaps so, in some measure. At least it should help us not to hate them. But there is a principle in jurisprudence that warrants the presumption that men intellectually intend to do the things they do, that they do think and for that reason are held accountable for their acts. The presumption is frequently violent, but it is a sound one to hold to. For what else are our minds and our power of thinking given us? What right can we have to go through the world careless of consequences? For what purpose were we given eyes except that we may see where we are going?

"Didn't mean to do it," is an excuse that may be taken with some measure of leniency from a heedless urchin, but that is one of the childish things that should be put away when one is grown. It will furnish but a poor excuse for lack of responsibility, for failure to be on the right side, for the tragedy of having lived a life that made the social order less healthful, the conditions of life harder for others to bear because one has lived. We hold accountable our hands, our feet, why not also our thoughts? And if we shall hold our thoughts accountable for what they do why shall we not also hold them accountable for not thinking of the things that we should think of? Why should we permit ourselves to be careless of consequences to others as well as to ourselves in the lives we live, the things we do, for what we are? Personal responsibility, if not heaven's first law, ranks second easily enough.

Personal responsibility is one of the most fundamental of all moral laws, responsibility for what we do not think as well as for what we do, for as a man thinketh not so is he as certainly as that the thoughts of a man make the man.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

How Our Population Grows

According to the United States census bureau, 9,771,512 aliens have come to this country by the immigration route since 1901, or more than a million a year. The figures will mean more to us if we compare them with others, and therefore let us do so. For instance, there is a tremendous tract of country in the United States west of a line including the North and South Dakotas and Texas. Yet, excluding, let us say, Kansas from that vast territory, its population according to the census of 1900 was less than the immigration to this country since 1901. Again, the entire population of New England, according to the census of 1900, was less than half the number of these immigrants. There has been an infusion of about eleven per cent of new and imported blood in about nine years. Where does this blood come from? Immigrants to the number of 1,761,948—little less than the present population of California—came from Southern Italy; 976,263—more than the population of Oregon and Washington combined in 1900—were Jews, mostly from Russia; 873,660 were Poles. While there are Southern Italians, Russian Jews and Poles who eventually make the best of citizens, their desirability as a class is questioned, and it is doubtful if our stock will be improved by that variety of inoculation. Nevertheless, that is what we are receiving to a large extent, and the problem concerning how to make the best of it is serious.

Simple Life Under Adverse Circumstances

Be a disciple or apostle of the simple life if you deem best, but beware of the quality of those who stroll where your simplicity displays itself in pristine beauty. It was the unfortunate misadventure of an apostle of the simple life in Germany that led to the foregoing philosophic reflection. The man's name is Heyer, and he had convinced himself that all that is needed to insure eternal life, or something approximating it, is a liberal sufficiency of sun baths taken without intervening clothing. So he retired to a lonely wood near Dresden, and there daily disported himself, clad in only bathing trunks and a bright and fascinating smile. One day, as he was thus cavorting around in his guise of the Simple Monarch of the Very Simplest Life, a man and two young women came upon him. The girls immediately screamed and fled, for they were not acquainted with the forms and ceremonies pertaining to the simple life, but the man remained long enough to threaten to knock the apostle down with his cane and to announce that he would bring the law to bear upon the disciple. As it turned out that the man was the King of Saxony and the young women were his daughters, there seemed to be no question that he could execute his threat if he desired. The story does not say whether he has done so, but it is a forty to one bet that the disciple and apostle is dispensing with a considerable number of sun baths in these days. So we cannot be too careful in obeying the demands of the simple life. To be sure, we have no king in this country, but Mr. Roosevelt is wandering around a good deal of late.

"The System of Ghent"

What is known as "the system of Ghent" is being adopted in many cities of various European countries. Concisely stated, the system consists of a plan for the assistance of unemployed laborers by municipalities. Its salient features, although they vary somewhat in different localities, are the following: Those who thus receive help must belong to some trade union or recognized association of employees; second, the city pays no allowance unless the lack of employment is involuntary, that is, not caused by strike, lockout, or even by illness or accident; third, the city pays but half as much as the union to which the workman belongs pays and never more than a definite and fixed amount; fourth, payment ceases as soon as work is obtained; fifth, if the union pays nothing, neither does the city. That the system must have much to recommend it is indicated by the fact that forty cities and several departments in France have adopted it, as have ten cities in Holland, while the state has done the same in Norway and in Denmark. At the present time a movement is on foot to have it adopted in Berlin, the fact that 80,000 organized workers recently have been without work adding emphasis to the movement.

Where Socialism Flourishes

It is in Germany that the utmost present force of the Socialistic party movement is witnessed. Vorwaerts, a Socialist publication, gives some facts in relation to it. According to it, while the party a year ago had an enrolled membership of 633,000, it now has such a membership of 720,000, an increase of nearly 14 per cent in a twelvemonth. The party now is represented in 19 out of 23 landtags of the various states, and in these nineteen parliaments there are 186 Socialist members, as against 140 a year ago, a gain of 33 per cent. In municipal offices there are 7,729 representatives of the party, whereas there were but 6,431 a year ago, a gain of about 20 per cent. It is a noteworthy fact that there is not a district throughout the German empire where Socialism has not shown progress. Thus, in brief, stands the record of Socialism in its own particular and chosen hothouse, but one need not look far to realize that it also progresses where conditions apparently are less favorable—in the United States of America, for instance.

Better Order Your Iron Now

When the international geological congress met at Stockholm the Swedish premier read a summary of sixty special reports compiled for the congress by governmental departments and scientific institutes in all iron-producing countries. According to this summary—and, of course, nothing could be more reliable—we are not as yet standing on the verge of an iron famine, but that verge is not so tremendously far away that it can be considered without some trepidation, for it is difficult to imagine just how the world would get along without iron. It appears that the visible supply of iron, amounting to about 10,000,000,000 tons of the metal, will, at the present rate of increase in its use, be exhausted in about sixty years, or while our children or grandchildren still are on the human stage. However, in addition to this visible supply, there is the potential supply, consisting of the ore which is not visible but is guessable. It is guessed that there is enough of this to make 53,000,000,000 tons of metal, or enough to last about 300 years. Of course this admittedly is rank guessing, but inasmuch as it postpones the ironless day to a more comfortable distance, the guess may as well be received with pleasure. The iron famine seems to be getting too close for comfort, anyway, but it is at least hopeable that when it arrives man will scrape up and husband the old iron scraps and manage to get along in some way.

Hotel Where Tips Are Unknown

In London, at the present time, an experiment is being made which should be observed with interest wherever men have lived, loved, suffered and tipped the waiter or porter. The experiment takes the form of an absolutely tipless hotel. No waiter or employee is permitted to accept a tip, and if he is caught in doing so he is at once discharged. Moreover, if any guest insists upon presenting tips he is compelled to cease or move on. How does the experiment succeed? Just as you might expect; it succeeds beyond the wildest dreams of its promoters. In the year the hotel has been open it has housed a quarter of a million guests, and never yet has it had a vacant bedroom. The difficulty is that every day the management has to turn people from its doors. It is noteworthy, too, that there is no difficulty about securing employees. They are well paid, and consequently are satisfied without tips.

THE TAX-REFORM AMENDMENT

(Article No. 3)

By Carl C. Plehn

The second article in this series dealt with the evils of the present system in a general way. This one will point out specifically some of the inequalities between localities, which constitute the second part of the indictment.

Almost every taxpayer knows of some actual cases of inequality in taxation. But few are those that try for any abatement. It may be that the taxpayer who suffers keeps silent because he knows that his own property is under assessed although not so much under-assessed as that of his neighbor. Or it may be that the evils are attributed in the popular mind to "corrupt politics," and it is hoped that they will be remedied in the millenium to come. But corruption is on the wane and the inequalities of taxation are growing greater every year.

The reason is not far to seek. It lies in the imposition of a state tax on the basis of an assessment of property made primarily for local purposes and by local assessors. Because the amount that his constituents will have to pay to the state will be determined by the total of his assessment of property in his county each county assessor endeavors to assess property at as small a proportion of the "true cash value" as possible. If he succeeds getting the proportional valuation lower than the other assessors do he saves his constituents money. No assessor can serve two masters, the state and his own constituents, and he naturally chooses the latter. For example, the State Board of Equalization found out that the county of Los Angeles had during the past five years saved in state taxes some $2,500,000, or about half a million per annum. Probably few people in the county knew of this or even understand how it was done, as was demonstrated by their resentment of the state board's action in raising the assessment. They certainly would not have resented it if they had but seen its justice. Their neighbor, Ventura county, has been profiting in even greater proportion, for, according to the state board's findings she has evaded half her state taxes, while Los Angeles only evaded two-sevenths.

It is bad enough that other counties whose assessors were for one reason or another unable to get their rolls as low as the twenty found guilty in 1909 should have to pay hundreds of thousands more taxes than is fair, but that is not all the story. Take San Bernardino as example of another case. Not only has this county been notoriously under-assessed, but she has for years and years been drawing from the state treasury more than she has paid in. Last year, as the state controller's reports will show, she drew out more than $200,000 in excess of what she paid in. Yet every county is supposed to help support the state institutions.

Shocking as all this is, there is still more to the tale. The state tax is also the cause of inequalities between parts of the counties. Many small cities find it hard to furnish "all modern improvements" in city government under the tax limits imposed in their charters. The only recourse is to raise the valuation of property taxed. But the county assessor cannot ignore this and he soon copies the assessments made by his colleague, the city assessor, but does not raise the valuation of property in districts where there is no such pressure—because of the state tax. The consequence is that some afflicted cities pay fifty and some one hundred per cent more county and state taxes than is their due. This is all beyond remedy by either the state or the county boards of equalization, because neither of them is legally empowered to raise or lower assessments by districts or by cities.

It is only because people regard matters of taxation as disagreeable mysteries and allow themselves to remain in ignorance of them that the state is not "burning with indignation" at the outrage of justice that the present tax system invokes.

PERSONALIA

Herman J. Ridgeway, publisher of Everybody's magazine, offered to take the Republican nomination for mayor of Montclair, N. J., and exhibit some reform in practice, but the benighted citizens turned him down at the Republican primaries in favor of Ernest C. Hink, a successful business man—who almost got the Democratic nomination at the same time.

John Fox, Jr., once wrote a story called "Hell-fer-Sartain," which made him famous. Though there really is a Hell-fer-Sartain creek down in the Kentucky mountains, the writer of the story had not been there until recently, when he visited the scene of his first successful fiction.

Anton Lang, the famous Cristus of the Oberammergau Passion Play, will shortly make his first visit to the Holy Land, under American auspices. A travel bureau of Boston has invited Lang and his wife to join its next Oriental cruise as guests of honor. Lang has accepted the invitation with keen delight. It realizes one of his lifetime ambitions. Only twice before has the remarkable portrayer of the Savior been away from his native heath; once, when he made a pilgrimage to Pope Leo XIII, and later when he visited England as the guest of English admirers.

Nine sculptors, two of them Americans, have submitted designs for the great Goethe Memorial to be erected in Chicago—A. Jaegers of New York; H. Schuler, Baltimore; Hugo Lederer, Berlin; C. A. Bermann, Munich; Hermann Hahn, Munich; Hubert Netzer, Munich; George Werba, Dresden; O. Schimkowitz, Vienna, and A. Hanak, Vienna. The competition has been decided at the Royal Academy, Berlin, by an international jury.

William H. Crane has a new play by George Ade, provisionally named "United States Minister Jackson," which he says he has not seen yet and knows nothing about, but will produce in November.

Miss Alice Thompson, University of California, 1905, is the soil chemist at the Hawaiian Agricultural Experiment Station, Honolulu. She will return to the United States this fall and enter Columbia University for advanced studies in chemistry.

Miss Ina Shepherd is said to be the only woman who holds the place of secretary to a clearing house association in this country. She has held that post in Birmingham, Ala., for more than five years. She handles the clearings of eight banks, amounting to between $12,000,000 and $15,000,000 a month. She is, moreover, a fine horsewoman and sings in a church choir and at concerts.

George W. Wrightson, 70 years old, still runs a railroad engine. He has seen 50 years of continuous service with the New York Central. He fired the engine of the train that smuggled Lincoln into Washington for his inaugural, and was engineer of the train that carried Lincoln's corpse to Springfield.

Holbrook Blinn, whose association with Mrs. Fiske for two years has been very successful, is to become a star under the management of William A. Brady in a play called "The Boss," written for him by Edward Sheldon, author of "Salvation Nell" and "The Nigger." The production will be made early in November.

Augustus Thomas's new comedy, "The Member from Ozark," was recently presented for the first time in Hartford and was well received. It is a play of love and politics and business, centering in a character named Desha Poultney, who is described by the reviewers as "Lincolnesque."

Levi P. Morton, who was vice-president of the United States when Benjamin Harrison was president, recently observed his 86th birthday. He retired from active work as a banker after serving for two years as governor of New York in 1896-98, but of course retains large interests in the financial world. He has a big farm at Rhinecliff-on-Hudson, N. Y., and gets a lot of satisfaction out of it.

Californian Poets' Corner

AT THE STEVENSON FOUNTAIN
(Old Portsmouth Square, San Francisco)
By Wallace A. Irwin

Perchance, from out the thousands passing by,—

The city's hopeless lotus-eaters these,
Blown by the four winds of the Seven Seas

From common want to common company,—
Perchance someone may lift his heavy eye
And smile with freshening memory when he sees

Those golden pennons bellying in the breeze
And spread for ports where fair adventures lie.

And O, that such a one might stay a space
And taste of sympathy, till to his ears Aight come the tale of him who knew the grace

To suffer sweetly through the bitter years,
To catch the smiles concealed in Fortune's face,

And draw contentment from a cup of tears!

SOUTHEY'S THOUGHTS

Southey probably deserves to rank as the most industrious of authors, says the London Chronicle. In the greater part of his life he spent fourteen hours a day in composition. He had six tables in his library. He wrote poetry at one, history at another, criticism at a third, and so on with the other subjects upon which he was engaged. He once described to Mme. de Stael the division of his time; two hours before breakfast for history, two hours for reading after, two hours for the composition of poetry, two hours for criticism, and so on through all his working day. "And pray, Mr. Southey," asked madame, "when do you think?"

O. HENRY'S READING

The late O. Henry, whose flippant and slangy stories gave him a great reputation as a humorist, was, in private life, a serious student.

A visitor to the library of Mr. Porter's New York residence was amazed at the ponderous histories and biographies on every side.

"But don't you read," said the visitor, "Ellis Parker Butler and writers of that sort?"

"Well, no," said Mr. Porter.

He laughed and added whimsically:

"I make fancy cakes and sell them, but I only eat bread and meat."

MOLIERE AND SHAKESPEARE

"Moliere is an artist always, and Shakespeare is an artist only intermittently." This is Brander Matthew's statement in the September North American Review, and he further says:

To push the comparison between these two great dramatic poets too far would be unfair to Moliere, since Shakespeare is the master-mind of all literature. He soared to heights and he explored depths, and he had a range to which Moliere could not pretend. His is the spirit of soul-searching tragedy, of youthful and graceful romantic comedy, of dramatic romance, of dramatized history; and in no one of these is Moliere his rival. But in the comedy of real life he is not Moliere's rival. In every variety of the comic drama Moliere is unequaled—in farce, in the comedy of situation, in the comedy of character, and in the comedy which is almost stiffened into drama, yet without ceasing to be comedy. Shakespeare's greatest strength is in tragedy, after all, even though he delights us also with comedy. Moliere is at home in comedy; only, even though he had a latent tragic possibility. "In depth, penetrativeness and powerful criticism of life, Moliere, comic as he is and not tragic, belongs to the same family as Shakespeare and Sophocles," so Matthew Arnold maintains, pointing out that he had also "one great advantage over Shakespeare" in that "he wrote for a more developed theatre, a more developed society."

SHEAR WIT

"And what sort of a town is yours—I didn't catch the name?" said the polite stranger on the train to the man who had been patiently listening to a long description of a Wisconsin lumbering city. "Bates," said the other, promptly, "and she's a comer! Two months old, a good band, a soap factory and more English sparrows than can sit on the telegraph wire! Oh, Bates is the real thing!"—Youth's Companion.

As a precaution against members of congress using the government mails for private purposes at the expense of the federal treasury, the envelopes in which tree garden seeds are sent to constituents bear in one corner this inscription: "Penalty for private use, three hundred dollars." The other day, says the Popular Magazine, Representative Winham A. Rodenberg, of Illinois, received the following letter from a farmer to whom he had sent a package of the seed: "Dear Congressman Rodenberg: I return under separate cover the seed you sent me as I would use them for private purposes, and this would make me liable to the $300 fine."

"That statement made me think," said a veteran newspaper man to the Cincinnati Times-Star, "of the celebrated row between President Cleveland's colored man and Secretary Hoke Smith's colored man. The two were exercising their master's horses out on a country road and got into a dispute as to what is the best thing in the world. Finally they made a bet of a dollar on it. 'Well, what is de bes' thing in the world?' asked Cleveland's man. 'Roas' possum and sweet taters,' said Hoke Smith's moke. 'Whoa,' says Cleveland's man, dragging at the bridle. He jumped to the ground, seized Hoke Smith's man by the leg and dragged him to the dust. 'Take that,' says he, lamming him on the neck. 'You miserable black rascal! You ain't leave me nothin' to guess at.'"

"The directors of the road were a precious lot of grafters." "You don't say so!" "Yes, every last man of them had his appendix removed, and charged the cost to operating expenses."—Puck.

The congresswoman had arrived and they were fitting up her desk. "It's not complete," said the presiding speaker. "But I have placed the pen holders and the pencil holders in position." "Yes, but where are the chewing gum and powder puff holders?"—Chicago News.

In a certain small English village there were two butchers living in the same street. One placarded his sausage at one shilling a pound, and the rival promptly placed eight-pence on his card. No. 1 then placed a notice in his window saying that sausage under one shilling could not be guaranteed. No. 2's response to this was the announcement: "I have supplied sausages to the king." In the opposite window the following morning appeared an extra large card, bearing the words: "God save the king!"—Ladies' Home Journal.

Jim McDermit, the lawyer, has a great fund of "darker" dialect stories, says the Newark Star. The one he most delights to tell follows: "A traveling salesman in a Southern town came to a small pond. An old negro was lolling contentedly in the sun with fishing rod in hand. The salesman paused and watched the fishing. After watching for half an hour without seeing the least sign of a bite he asked how the fish were biting. The fisher looked surprised. 'Why, boss,' he exclaimed, 'dere ain't no fish in dis yere pond. Dere never was a fish in it.' 'Well, what do you fish for?' the salesman wanted to know. 'So's my old woman can see dat I ain't got no time to chop wood for de fire,' the negro answered."

"Good morning, sir," said the artist, politely. "that's a perfect coat of yours down there in the field. I'd like to paint her if you don't mind." "By heck!" exclaimed Farmer Korn-top. "I reckon ye won't. Git outer hyar! I'm tired o' you 'Perkins' Purple Pills' fellers."—Catholic Standard and Times.

JUSTICE M. C. SLOSS

HIS RECORD AS A LAWYER AND AS JUDGE IN TWO COURTS

Justice M. C. Sloss, of the Supreme Court of California, was born in New York City, February 28, 1869. He was the youngest of the four sons of the late Louis Sloss, who came to California in '49 and who afterward gained considerable fortune and reputation as a pioneer in the fur trade and other enterprises in Alaska.

As a child of three years, Max Sloss was brought to California by his parents, and has lived here ever since except for absences in the pursuit of education. In his boyhood, he spent three years in Germany, the native land of his parents, attending a German school. But the most of his primary education was received in San Francisco, where he completed his grammar course and took part of the high school work preparing for college. Many men now in business in San Francisco remember him as a classmate at Lowell High School, where he kept at the head of his classes and was reputed to have done no studying to speak of to maintain that lead. He left high school without graduating, to complete his preparation for college at Reid's school, Belmont. His university education was received at Harvard, from which he graduated in 1890, and his legal education at Harvard Law School, from which he graduated in 1893. An enthusiastic friend and admirer declares that he made the most brilliant record in law school of any graduate in fourteen years, but Judge Sloss is known to have denied this flattering compliment with the ironical remark that he had not heard of it yet, and that, as he graduated nearly eighteen years ago, he would probably know it by this time if it were true. However, Judge Sloss did graduate cum laude, which is as high honor as the school bestows, and Harvard Law School ranks first among the law schools of America.

Judge Sloss returned to San Francisco from Harvard and immediately entered practice as a member of the firm of Chickering, Thomas & Gregory, one of his partners being William Thomas, now of Thomas, Gerstle, Frick & Beedy. Judge Sloss practiced law for seven years.

In November, 1900, he was elected to the superior court bench of San Francisco, taking office Jan. 1, 1901. Here he was fortunate. Usually the junior members of that bench are assigned the criminal departments, which are generally considered less desirable than the civil departments. But it happened at the time of Judge Sloss's election that the three judges who then had the criminal cases preferred that class of work, and Judge Sloss immediately received a department devoted exclusively to civil cases, which were more to his taste. Nearly all his work on the superior bench was in equity cases and other cases without jury.

In cases of this character Judge Sloss had an opportunity to pass on several questions involving principles theretofore undecided by the courts of the state, and in some instances the decisions he handed down have become precedents that are still frequently applied to similar cases. At that time the then new city charter had just gone into effect, and many problems arose, concerning particularly the status of civil service employees and of the administrative commissions of the city government. Nearly all the cases were tried before either Judge Sloss or Judge Seawell. The decision rendered by Judge Sloss in the case involving the right of Mayor Schmitz to oust by force the old board of health is a precedent in a case now pending. In that case Judge Sloss issued an injunction against Mayor Schmitz and laid down as a principle of law the dictum that, where an appointive officer refuses to surrender his office to a successor on the ground that the appointing official has no power to oust him, the incumbent is entitled to peaceable possession of his office pending decision of the courts as to his legal status. The dictum amounts, in effect, to an injunction to keep the peace until the courts decide a moot question by due process of law. It has been followed as a precedent several times since in various cities of the state, and the present board of education in San Francisco is holding office against Mayor McCarthy's will by virtue of it.

Another interesting point decided by Judge Sloss was in connection with the famous libel action brought by Governor Gage against the San Francisco Call. The Call had virtually charged Governor Gage with grafting the labor of prisoners in one of the state penitentiaries to make furniture for his personal use, and the governor sued for libel. But he also attempted to compel the defendants to defend the suit in Los Angeles, four hundred miles from the scene of the alleged libel, on the ground that Los Angeles county was the complainant's place of residence. If this contention had been successful, it would have added enormously to the cost of the defense, and indirectly would have denied the assumption of innocence to the defendants. As a precedent, it would have compelled newspapers generally to defend suits all over the state, and would have laid them open to constant harassment. A second prosecution was started at San Francisco, where the paper was published. Judge Sloss decided that while such suits may, under the constitution, be tried either in the county where the paper is published, or the county where the person claiming to be libeled resides, the latter cannot exercise a choice so as to compel the trial to be held in the county of his residence, rather than the place of publication.

Still another decision of great interest at the time and of importance as a precedent, was handed down from the superior bench by Judge Sloss. This was in the case of Johnson vs. The Hotel and Restaurant Employees' Union. During a strike the union had boycotted and picketed Johnson's place and had used violence to make the boycott effective. Johnson prayed for a restraining order to enjoin the boycott and picketing and sued for damages. The case attracted tremendous interest, as the legal rights of strikers had not been determined in California, or in many other states, at that time. Judge Sloss's decision recognized the right of the union to strike, the right of its members as individuals to boycott, and the right of the union members to use peaceable persuasion to extend the boycott to the general public, but denied the right of the union to use violence, misrepresentation or intimidation for this purpose. This decision, also, amounted substantially to a command to keep the peace. It was unpopular at the time it was rendered, both with the unions because it did not allow them full license to win a strike at any price, and with the employers because it recognized that the unions had any rights at all. But the substantial justice of the decision is now generally conceded by both sides, and its legality has been repeatedly affirmed by the supreme court, notably, in recent cases, in Parkinson vs. The Building Trades Council and in Pierce vs. The Stablemen's Union.

In 1905, before his term on the superior bench expired, Judge Sloss received from Governor Pardee the tender of a seat on the supreme court bench to take the place of Justice Walter Van Dyke, who had died. Judge Sloss accepted and took office Feb. 1, 1906. Under the law such an appointment holds only till the next general election, so Judge Sloss was a candidate at the election of November, 1906, to succeed himself for the remainder of Justice Van Dyke's unexpired term. He was elected. The term expires with the end of the present year, and Judge Sloss is now a candidate on the Republican ticket to succeed himself for a full term.

When he was appointed to the supreme bench Judge Sloss was only 36 years old, so he was probably one of the youngest men who ever sat in that court. This is not a bad precedent from any point of view. In Judge Sloss's case it happened that the youngest member of the court was also rated by the legal profession as one of the ablest members. And, in general, at thirty-six a man is at his prime, and he is also in closer touch with the spirit of his day than he is likely to be when he is fifty. It is a good thing to have the law of the land expounded by men whom age has not crystalized and whose minds are still resilient and open to the influence of public opinion of the better sort.

During his service on the supreme bench, Judge Sloss has written probably 200 or 300 decisions. Most of these, naturally, were in more or less routine cases, but at least two of them are of first importance, both because of interest in them at the time and because they are precedents. The first upheld the validity of the McEnerney act, passed by the legislature as an emergency measure to provide a legal method of restoring records of real estate titles destroyed by the great San Francisco fire of 1906. The finality of this decision is still in doubt, as the case has been carried to the supreme court of the United States, which has not yet passed on it, but there is no great reason to suppose that it will reverse the action of the state courts.

The other decision referred to above sustained the ordinance of the board of supervisors of San Francisco prohibiting the burial of human remains within the city limits. This ordinance was opposed by the cemetery associations. The decision is far-reaching in its effects, as it will not only mean the ultimate removal of existing cemeteries, but it will also undoubtedly result in the passage of similar ordinances in other large cities.

Outside of his legal work, Judge Sloss's principal interest is in charities. He is the president of the Pacific Hebrew Orphan Asylum and Home Society. He is also president of the Federation of Jewish Charities, an organization formed for the purpose of eliminating duplications of gifts for Hebrew charities and for the better systematization of the work of solicitation and accounting. Besides his connection with charitable work, Judge Sloss is one of the trustees of the San Francisco Public Library, which has the distinction of paying proportionately less for administrative expenses and more for books and equipment than any other library in the country.

In private life he is the father of two boys and a girl in whom he is wrapped up. Mrs. Sloss, who was Miss Hecht, of Boston, before her marriage, is prominent in club work in San Francisco. Judge Sloss is something of a linguist: speaks German and reads French; and he still follows his interest in history and political economy, as he did in college days.

In forming an estimate of Judge Sloss as a member of the supreme court and a candidate for re-election, it is fair to take into account other things in addition to his record on the bench and his reputation as a lawyer. His record as judge has been sketched here. His ability as a lawyer is conceded by everybody who is competent to judge it. But one other thing is quite as much to his credit: Judge Sloss was born to great wealth and to the temptations to be idle that go with that condition. He deserves praise that he has added industry to ability, and has applied himself faithfully to a laborious career. It is also something of a qualification that he seeks continuance in an office whose salary could by no chance be of any moment to him. It is an assurance that he is in public life for the love of it and for the opportunity to earn the honor of the community. It is a good thing for the community when men who can afford to live without employment seek public office for these reasons.

GEN. SHERMAN IN CALIFORNIA

A Confederate veteran who knew Gen. Tecumseh Sherman before the war, writes:

I heard General Sherman say that he had learned to command, to decide, when in the bank in San Francisco; that he had often there said "yes" or "no" when he didn't know whether he was right or wrong, only he believed he was right; but that it was the time to decide, and that he would rather promptly decide a thing wrong at the right time than to be undecided and put it off. So it was often with him years after in campaign and battle; he was ever prompt and decided. This habit of mind, with his naturally quick and intuitively unerring thought, made him a dangerous antagonist, a great commander.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

A Common Prayer

Almighty Father, at whose behest
The pale star-lamps are lighted,
Giver of all by all possessed,
Ruler of realms unsighted,
I thank Thee that to me, a clod,
A worm of vermin brains, it
Was given to know the thought of God—
My creed, Thou know'st, explains it.

Behold, the universal wheel
Revolves as Thou hast bidden;
The planets roll, the comets reel
Through spaces dim and hidden;
And, "Whence, and whither?" was our cry.
A council met, austere,
Outlined to us Thy purpose high—
My creed explains it clearly.

So 'mid the maze of earthly things
I go my way securely;
Let others crawl with broken wings,
I fly serene and surely.
I might have chosen creeds that jar
My creed and quite distress me—
That I am not as others are
I thank and praise and bless Thee.
That but my creed is perfect, then,
My gratitude. Ahmen! Ahmen!

Concerning the Hour of Night

You wake in the night, although you would have preferred not to do so, and lie there and think, and think. In the distance a dog is baying its eternity-old defiance to the moon; somewhere a nestling bird sleepily twitters to its mate; a cat is warbling that chant of love at which the world has shuddered since first a feline sat on Adam's back fence and wooed Marier. But you do not mind these things, for it is up to you to think, and think. By your side, your dear wife laughs cheerily, for in her dream she is happily shopping. Of course, you are passionately fond of your adored one, but what right has she, you say to yourself, to be asleep while you lie awake and think and think?

Why should one's errors, failures and in-iquities recall themselves so insistently at such a time, and—I wonder what time it is.

This is the first time, in that melange of regretful thought, that this question about the time has obtruded itself, but after this it never quite forsakes you. The hours drag on, and the clock ticks and ticks, but it does not strike. Queer about that clock! Three or four hours, at least, must have passed since you waked, and yet it has not struck; something must be wrong with the bell. This eternal time of waking! What right has your wife to be asleep? She wouldn't be if she really loved you and sympathized with you.

That dratted clock! Somebody ought to hit it with a hammer. What is the use of a timepiece that doesn't know enough to strike, anyway? Well, if you must—

You crawl out of bed, immediately fall over a chair, and, while you are rubbing your shins and thinking perfervid thoughts, your wife says, "No, I will take six yards off the other piece." and—the clock strikes three!

Why is it that the clock won't strike, no matter how many suffering hours you lie in bed waiting for it? Why is it that it always strikes just as soon as you have got out of bed and hurt yourself? Why—but what is gained by asking? These are the problems that make life interesting, and nobody answers them.

As We Differently View Suet

"Never," said the man with the poetic soul, —"never do I look upon a pan of suet without my whole spirit responding to its mute poetic suggestion."

"I—er—I guess I don't catch the connection," said the man of the crude, practical nature.

"Why, you know: 'Grease, but living grease no more.'"

So they went to a neighboring establishment to arbitrate it.

The Opinions of Rufus

I dispise shoddy pretence, but I can't help noticin' that it wins consider'ble many tricks in the game of life es men play it.

F'rinstance, ain't you seen men win out when they hadn't much of anything to recommend 'em 'cept a solemn air an' a large stummick?

When John D. Rockefeller heard that it was easier fer a camel to go through the eye of a needle than fer a rich man to enter into the Kingdom of Heaven I've been told that he first sighed, and then says, "Well, if the needle's a big one an' well oiled I b'lieve the camel could do it. I've a good deal of faith in oil." This explains why he ain't es one without hope.

I don't claim they ain't any sech thing es a fashionable church, but, anyway, I'm middlin' certain that the Man of Nazareth didn't set the fashion.

I can't know a man long 'nough to know his creed 'less he tells it to me, but I don't have to know him very long to know whether he's a good man or not.

Sometimes seems to me that the best part of life ain't what we have today, but what we hope for tomorrow and remember of yesterday.

Honesty's the best policy, but Josh Bings says the trouble is so many fellers read the mottor wrong an' make policy their best honesty.

Es I remember it, folks used to b'lieve in eternal damnation—'cept fer their families.
Somehow, they couldn't help trustin' there must be an exception in their case.

"Stolen fruit is sweetest," but prob'ly you've noticed that the digestin' of it sometimes is consider'ble painful.

A hero is a man who has been brave or noble—an' had the fact largely advertised.

A heroine is—well, I reckon it's most any woman that's keepin' house on a slender income fer a husband an' several children.

Just a Little More

I knew a man who little asked,

And just a little more;
That care should come disguised and masked,
And just a little more.

He said: "'Tis little that I need,
A bird and bottle for my feed,
An auto and some cash, indeed,
And just a little more."

One day he took a "smile" or two,

And just a little more,
Till all things doubled on his view,
And just a little more.

He sought his home at half past two,
And while the pavement upward flew
The little stars played peek-a-boo,
And just a little more.

His wifie met him with a frown,

And just a little more,
And said, the while she knocked him down,
And just a little more:

"It pains me thus to fondle you,
But still my duty I must do."
Next day his eye was black and blue,
And just a little more.

The moral of my tale is tough,

And just a little more;
Best be content with just enough,
And not a little more,
For, oh, the giddy way, you know,
Leads on to trouble, pain and woe,
To swollen heads that grow and grow,
And just a little more.

Cupid Out of Luck

Once Master Cupid shot a bolt

To hit a pretty maiden—
The arrow was by Passion made;
'Twas frenzied yearning laden.

"Ah, woe is me, or woe is I,"
He cried—his bow, he dropped it—
"In vain do I my archery try.
Her hat and hair, they stopped it!"

Thoughtful Man on the Situation

"'Tis claimed," said the 'Thoughtful Man,
"that these are not prosperous times, that the people are restless and dissatisfied, and that this is why they have voted for insurgent Republicans, Democrats and the Mayor of Milwaukee. 'Tis false. There's nothing to it."

"I think so?" I remarked.

"Sure! Look about you, and you'll see," he responded. "When before in the history of the world has there been a Rockefeller who has laid up a half billion on earth and a still greater treasure in Heaven? When has there been a Morgan who, besides owning the rest of us, has expended millions for works of art and their imitations? When has there been a Calhoun, who, out of pure goodness of heart, has donated $200,000 to a number of poor but noble grafters and boodlers whom he admired?
And everyone could be a Rockefeller, a Morgan or a Calhoun. There isn't a thing in our laws to hinder, and only a few men are too decent."

"I hadn't thought about that," I said.

"And there is another absolute demonstration that these are prosperous times," the Thoughtful Man continued. "Everybody who is alive eats and wears clothing, and one need but study the market reports in order to know they must be well off to be able to do that.
Oh, 'rah for our prosperity, the kind we got from G. O. P.! There ain't no question that it's here, and so I'll take a stein of—"

I interrupted him sternly. "Then how do you account for their recent votes?" I inquired.

"Ever watch a dyspeptic?" the Thoughtful Man responded. "Ever watch him kick and groan around just because he had had a square meal? Well, that is what ails the people.
They are dyspeptic, and they have been living too high."

"Could you suggest a remedy?" I inquired.

"Well, I should suggest giving the dyspeptic people a pill, only—"

"Only what?"

"They have been giving them to us, instead."

A Delightful Little Story

A story, entitled "Healthy Los Angeles," which now is going the boiler-plate rounds of the newspapers to a certain extent, is richer in unconscious humor than anything which has limped in this direction recently. It is credited to Luther Burbank, but it is unnecessary for him to announce that he had nothing to do with it. It runs like this:

"The other day a hale but very aged couple boarded a Los Angeles river steamboat." (Listen to that! Did you ever see the Los Angeles river and mistake it for a sand-pile?)

The story continues its mad career by asserting that the purser of the Los Angeles river steamboat asked the aged couple if they were about to travel; whereupon the veteran explained that they were so old that they were tired of living, and so were "going down to San Francisco to die."

Picture it! A pair of world-worn centenarians taking a Los Angeles river steamboat to go "down" to San Francisco to die!
Nothing could add to the richness of such a work of art. Its rare and racy humor is so deliciously unconscious that it seems best to label it a literary triumph, and let it go at that.

A Tenacious Evil Thought

"Wiscun used to be a Christian Scientist."

"So I have understood."

"But he isn't any more."

"Why not? What happened?"

"He got his leg under a railroad train, and he can't get rid of the evil thought that he is minus a foot."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Refreshed and Illuminated

On Sunday the President will return to Washington fresh from the golf links of the Massachusetts coast and, on the day following, he will gather his official family about him in the cabinet chamber. They will note a change in their chief. A new light will shine from his eyes. He will have speculation in them. Since he took his vacation from the White House he has heard from California and Maine, New Hampshire and Wisconsin, Michigan and Washington state, also from Tawney; the Lion Hunter has swung around the circle, the branding iron has been applied to Lorimer, Kansas talked something other than corn, hogs and weather and the scrap at Saratoga will be in full swing. Verily, the President's vacation has not been lacking in diversions. If William Howard Taft could first make Charles E. Hughes Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and then swap chairs with him wouldn't he jump at the chance? There is talk of decisive changes in the personnel of the cabinet, but to The Watchman they do not seem likely. The President is a pacificator. He will make further concessions to the progressive spirit in the interests of harmony in the party, but anything akin to an about-face and counter-march is not to be looked for from him. He yields to pressure but is not easily spurred to action. He may make up to Cummins and Dolliver, but he is not likely to break with Aldrich or Lodge. He will bend to the storm, but will not be swept from his conservative moorings. He has been true to himself from the first and what he has been he is and will remain to the end. We may expect modifications, not transformations from the President.

The Big Fight Of the Year

The big fight of the primary season will take place in New York Monday. It is of little use to try to forecast the immediate result. The ultimate outcome may be predicted with greater certainty. It may be that the "Old Guard" will control the state convention in spite of Theodore Roosevelt and his progressive associates. The presidential influence will help him some, but, characteristic of our chief executive, he halts half way. He favors the direct primary for nominating members of congress and the legislature, but is not sure about the whole state and county tickets. If it is good for part it is good for all. Being slated for the supreme bench Governor Hughes has about as much influence with the "Old Guard" as a dead king would have with the privy council of his successor. The fight is Roosevelt's fight and he will win it if he lives long enough. He will carry the issue from the convention to the legislature and from the legislature to the people of New York, and he will skin the "Old Guard" alive before he is through with them. Otherwise government of the people cannot endure. But The Watchman looks hopefully for a winning fight for Roosevelt in the forthcoming convention. There is no sound reason why The Wave should be turned back at New York after having swept so far. If the direct primary, unvexed, open and free, does not come to New York through the Republican party it will come through the Democratic, and even Republican Bourbonism will hesitate to take that plunge. Here's hoping.

The Shadow Of 1912

The mind of the politician is overshadowed by the presidential contest of 1912, but that of the American citizen is not and will not be for a full half year. It will be time enough to consider presidential candidates after the present congress shall have adjourned and the character of the new congress shall have been made evident. There is no hurry. There are those whose anxieties are excited and visions obscured because of the Lion Hunter, but he will eliminate himself at the psychological moment. If he were to do so now it might weaken his power for effective work for free government. A knowledge of what he could do if he would exert a wholesome restraint upon the interests. It may even make the President more aggressively progressive, and Theodore Roosevelt is not a lighter to throw away a good club and go at it with bare hands if there is any chance that a club would be more serviceable. But The Watchman has not the remotest idea that Theodore Roosevelt will ever again be a candidate for president. He will be more powerful out of office than in, as leader of that part of the American hosts capable of a sustained moral purpose than in any office that can be given him. He may conclude to succeed Depew in the senate of the United States, although that is less and less likely as the strength of being party leader becomes more apparent. We ought all of us to cease worrying about 1912, anyhow until 1911 is half gone.

And Tawney Went, Too

Next to Joe Cannon The Interests had no more serviceable agent in the House of Representatives than "Jim" Tawney of the first Minnesota congressional district. He was a thorn in the flesh of Roosevelt and has proven the hoodoo of Taft. The Watchman happens to know that, a few weeks before he started out on his swing around the circle, the President told former Governor Pardee and another that Tawney could not come back if the President could prevent it. Pressure induced the President, not alone to withdraw opposition, but to go into Tawney's district and give him a clean bill of political health. It was that Winona address that proved the presidential undoing. It cost the Republican party hundreds of thousands of votes and the President's hold upon the public mind and heart was fearfully shaken. Not until Tuesday of this week did the constituents of Tawney get an opportunity to say what they think of Tawney. They have spoken. A majority of 2,500 has been turned into a minority of 2,500. Tawney has been turned down. Tough as he is, a Minnesota September frost nipped him. It is unfortunate that the victory of the progressive forces did not go far enough to sweep Stevens and Nye into the same vortex, but they were not so offensive as Tawney. Their service to The Interests had been as consistent and persistent as the services of Tawney, but perhaps not as insistent. The fate of Tawney may be a lesson to them. It was a famous victory.

Francis J. Heney Had a Hand In It

It is gratifying to the spirit of Adam that is in us to know that Francis J. Heney took a hand in the defeating of "Jim" Tawney for re-nomination for congress. It served Tawney right. When Mr. Heney was in the height of his fight against graft in San Francisco Tawney obliged the grafters by giving out the information that Heney had been paid by the government in such a way as to imply that it was for services rendered while prosecuting the grafters. It was a trick that served for the time-being, although afterward so fully explained as to react on Tawney, but Heney remembered. While up in Wisconsin helping La Follette Mr. Heney crossed over into Minnesota and gave Tawney a boost down hill by speaking for Sidney Anderson, the successful insurgent candidate. He held large and enthusiastic meetings at Austin and Rochester. Mr. Heney's return to California has been further delayed by additional calls to work for progressive Republicanism in close eastern districts. Everywhere he goes the people turn out to hear him and it cannot be amiss for him to make his reputation more thoroughly national now that he has the opportunity. On the 19th, he addressed the City Club of Chicago and was listened to with great interest.

How S. C. Smith Faces the Music

Hon. S. C. Smith, representing the eighth district of California in congress, is no ostrich. He does not shut his eyes to a painful truth or ram his head into the sand to escape observation. He faces the music bravely and not apologetically. He recognizes that the voters in the eighth district to the number of 10,000 or more, voted, not for Kirby, but against Smith, but he is not quite sure why. He is confident that he did not do anything that it was not necessary to do in order to secure that measure of protection for his district which the people of his district wanted. The leaders in the Lincoln-Roosevelt movement recognized that Smith could be beaten but, knowing that he naturally belonged with them and not against them, as in the case of Needham, they took into account the embarrassments of his position and forebore to lend any aid or comfort toward his defeat or that of Needham. Their positions were trying. Smith is a shrewd politician and "does politics" according to the rules of the game, but he is not soft spoken and rather loves a fight for its own sake. He will not go through his district apologizing for his course. He will justify it to the best of his ability, will take what is coming to him and, if not beaten by a blank space on the opposing party's ticket, will be re-elected this time. After that, well, much may happen within the next two years.

The Case of Spalding

Those politically astute gentlemen who had the hospitality to make the stranger within our gates candidate for United States senator are fearful lest they be deprived of their prize when nearly within reach. If consummated it will be a good joke on California but not a better one than the state has been the victim of more than once. It can stand it. It has had few senators of senatorial size and if Spalding is, or no, no man knows. But he can be sure of a square deal. The official returns show that he has carried seventy-four legislative districts to forty for Judge Works. It took adroit work and plenty of money to accomplish that and the fact that it was accomplished suggests that the "organization" was doing work for Spalding to the neglect of Meserve, who also ran. But that cuts no figure in the case of Spalding, the sporting man. In the first place the vote is advisory only. Legislators may be governed by it or not as they may or may not have pledged themselves to be governed. No influence will be brought by the friends of Judge Works to induce any legislator to break faith with his constituents. Whichever gets the majority of the Republican districts, when the election shall have shown what districts the Republicans have carried, will no doubt be the caucus nominee of the Republican party. That any district will be allowed to slump into the Democratic column because the Republican legislative candidate, if elected, would be pledged to Spalding is preposterous to suggest. There may be some districts in which notoriously unfit Republicans should be defeated by notoriously fit Democrats, but the people in those districts will take care of that without outside interference from any quarter.

The Campaign Of Caminetti

When Abraham Lincoln called for "Three hundred thousand more" volunteers to fight the common enemy for the salvation of the country the recruiting officers did not demand to know of applicants for enlistment if they were Republicans, Democrats or old line Whigs. What they did demand to know was if they had enlisted for the war and were willing to take the oath of loyalty to the union. There is a fight on now not less threatening to the national life than was the conflict of nine-and-forty years ago. Then it was whether or not the nation should survive. Now it is whether or not a government of and by The People shall give place to government of and by a plutocratic oligarchy masquerading in the form of popular government but without its substance. A. Caminetti has volunteered for that fight and on the side of popular sovereignty. The Watchman does not know Clark Howard, the Republican nominee for senator from the tenth district. For aught The

("Political Table Talk"—Concluded)

Watchman knows he may be a bigger, brainier, broader and better trained legislator than Mr. Caminetti and his loyalty to government by The People may be as unquestioned. Nothing herein is said against him; but unless he is at least the equal of Caminetti in all these respects it would be a misfortune to the state not to have Mr. Caminetti in his seat in the state senate. Despite some tendencies to hark back to the ancient and unchangeable democracy of the fathers Senator Caminetti proved himself one of the most reliable and useful, independent and free, members of the last two legislatures, and he stood for Right Things even if he had to stand alone. The voters of the tenth senatorial district should well consider and compare the characters and capacities of these two men, rather than their party affiliations, before making choice between them. Senator Caminetti is, on the floor or in committee, wonderfully alert, watchful, not easily bluffed and he knows how to handle himself like an athlete. May the victory go to the man best fitted for the fight ahead of us.

Mr. Bell Has No All honor to Theodore Priority of Claim Bell for making the fight he did four years ago, but he was no original discoverer of opposition to railroad domination in the politics of California. The Watchman is ready to qualify that the Fresno Republican, for instance, has been waging that war for a quarter of a century and so has The Watchman, to the extent of his abilities, the more especially since the campaign of 1896, when he first realized the cinch-like hold the Southern Pacific had upon party management in this state. Four years ago, some sixty thousand Republicans revolted and voted for Bell because of the action of the Santa Cruz convention and, in the apt language of Hiram Johnson, "No party and no individual has a patent right to that which is good." Although Mr. Johnson began his fight against railroad domination in Sacramento eight years ago, instead of four, priority of discovery does not constitute preponderance of claim. The issue is, which is the fitter man of the two to carry this fight to a finish, and the triumph of which party will mean the most to the cause of free government? Without disparagement of Mr. Bell or his party The Watchman believes that Hiram Johnson will prove the stronger man and that the one thing most essential at this time is the triumph of the regenerated Republican party in California. That would be a clincher.

THE CALL OF THE DAY

WHICH IS THE CALL FOR MEN

By PROF. BURT ESTES HOWARD, of Stanford University

[This article is the stirring address delivered by Professor Howard before the Commonwealth Club at luncheon on Saturday, September 10th.—The Editor.]

It is becoming increasingly difficult to be honest in any walk of life. There may be room for argument as to the reason for it, but there can be no dispute as to the fact of it. It meets us at every turn. Life, in these days, is a succession of moral crises. Each man of us who attempts to do business in any form, professional, commercial, even ecclesiastical, finds himself led into a wilderness to be tempted of the devil of Graft. The world is bitten with a desire to obtain wages without an equivalent of work and to secure the prizes of life without fairly earning them. This charge can be laid at the door of no special class. All classes are tainted with it. The man who would conduct his affairs honestly and squarely must needs enter into an unfair competition with swindlers and tricksters, with quacks and charlatans, with thieves and liars. We are rapidly reaching a point in our private and public life where we must choose between personal and corporate integrity and national decay. The immortality of any people rests on their fidelity to immortal principles.

The Disease

We have grown sick at heart, then indignant, over disclosures of graft and greed in numerous great corporate interests. Our spirit has waxed hot within us as there have been uncovered before our eyes evidences of political rottenness and betrayal of public trusts. A wave of moral revulsion is sweeping over the country, an insurging tide of moral awakening that is the earnest of a new day. We are looking for remedies to heal the ills our body politic is heir to. We shall easily mislead ourselves in the search for nostrums, patent or other, which shall cure our moral and political ailments. The disease lies too deep for legislative or social fads to eradicate it.

Individual Morality the Need

We Anglo-Saxons are noted for an implicit faith in law. Law is not so much constructive as it is restrictive. It does not define the moral equipment of a people, but it merely marks the level below which the moral conduct of that people cannot fall and still expect the support of the government. Law can affect the forms in which our commercial and political life is uttered, but it cannot put a right spirit at the heart of those forms. Social schemes and economic theories, looking to legislation for their realization, may be in a measure and for a season efficient, but they cannot be sufficient. Socialism may create an economic Garden of Eden, but it cannot put a moral backbone in Adam or render the garden snake-proof. Righteousness cannot be legislated, it must be lived. Righteousness must become a personal habitude before it can become a social force. It is not social theories that we need, but individual morality. Corporations, whether commercial or political, are simply the forms in which the individual commercial and political life organizes itself. Corporations, whether commercial or political, are fictitious persons by courtesy of the law. The members composing those corporations are moral persons by the fact of life. Corporations, as such, are neither moral nor immoral. They may furnish opportunity for the men who compose them to do moral or immoral things, but they have no will apart from the will of their members, and their moral character is a composite of the moral character of the men who control them.

Every great reform is built on the scale of one. We must get back of legislation and back of socialism to the individual unit if we would make the work of reform sure. No great uplift is possible which overlooks the individual man, and undertakes to reform men in the lump.

Personal Righteousness the Foundation

The social and political status of any community, under a democratic form of government, is no worse than the social and political conscience of that community. The social and political conscience of any community is the resultant of the individual consciences of that community, actively uttered in its affairs. The ultimate responsibility for evil conditions, whether social or political, does not lie in the forms in which the social or political life organizes itself, but in the individual integers who make up that particular community. A righteous society cannot be created out of unrighteous men. The Almighty himself cannot make a good government out of bad citizens, or a strong government out of an apathetic people. Any work on the masses will fail that does not involve a prior work on the man. Improved conditions are of no avail without improved character to live in them. We shall never have honest government or honest business methods by any outside system of legislative checks and balances, but only when the people get over their personal dishonesty. Such fault as exists today in the business and political world, does not lie in the forms of society and business so much as in the factors that compose society and business. No mere shifting of the social or political mechanism will heal the hurt of the nation. We cannot have fair business dealing or straight politics till our citizens are willing to put more conscience into their business and their politics. We cannot eradicate the evils that infest our day until we reach the point where we put a higher value on morals than on money; where we would rather be righteous than rich; where we would rather be men than millionaires.

Man's Full Part

The call of the day is a call to play a man's full part in a world of men. This involves a higher standard of values than this busy age seems to be given to, and a different measure of success. We are living in an economic period, when thought is dominated by economic ideas. We are striving for economic achievement. We are figuring up values in economic terms. To the great bulk of men success in life means merely the accumulation of stuff. We are given to rating each other by the amount of material we have heaped up outside ourselves. We are calling those men our representative men, who are representative of nothing but a certain shrewd muck-wisdom which enables them to thrust their hand in where pay dirt is to be found. Even education has come to mean the qualifying of our youth for economic supremacy. Universities are seeking short cuts by which they may send their students forth into what they are pleased to call "practical life." So keen is our scent for material gain that we grudge our boys and girls the time spent in developing the humanities. We are teaching our young men that culture is secondary to cash, and we are in grave danger of dulling the edge of their moral sensibilities till they come to think that the chief thing in life is to get on and the subordinate thing to get honest.

Manhood Needed, Not Muck.

If our times are to be saved there must be a return to a philosophy based not on muck but on manhood. We must learn to measure a man in terms of what he is rather than of what he has. We must recognize the fundamental principle that a man's worth cannot be properly estimated by the amount of stuff he has accumulated, but by the amount of qualities that make for manhood which he has assimilated.

We must get to know that the biggest and finest thing in God Almighty's world is a clean, white-souled, honest man, whether he sits upon a throne and wears the royal purple, or walks barefooted along life's dusty highways. We must get a new and divine vision of the dignity of our own manhood.

We must explode the theories which permit market quotations to outweigh men in the world's estimation and allow an aristocracy of gilded mud to take precedence of homely virtues.

Individualism vs. Socialism

Whatever views we may hold with respect to socialism, we should never lose our hold, in the midst of these great and confusing mass-movements, on the value of the individual. While teaching men the worth of social relationships we must not overlook the worth of the man. Socialism is purchased at too great a price when it blots out the units which compose society or gives them a minimized sense of their own value. What we need in these days more than all else is a quickened appreciation, on the part of every man of us, of his own share in the responsibility for social uplift and in the work of securing it. We need to inspire men with a mighty faith in the power of their own spirit. Mr. W. E. Henley wrote a poem some years ago that illustrates what I mean:

"Out of the night that covers me,
Black as the pit from pole to pole,
I thank whatever gods may be
For my unconquerable soul."

"In the fell clutch of circumstance
I have not winced nor cried aloud;
Under the bludgeonings of chance
My head is bloody, but unbowed."

"Beyond this place of wrath and tears
Looms but the horror of the shade;
And yet the menace of the years
Finds, and shall find, me unafraid."

"It matters not how strait the gate
How charged with punishment the scroll,
I am the Master of my fate,
I am the Captain of my soul!"

Call this poem atheistic or skeptical as you like, but there is a fine ring to it, a stout courage, a bold willingness to shoulder the responsibility for what he is and does, that shames the flabby opportunism that infests these present days. Whatever may be the condition of his soul, it is his soul, and he is the Captain of it. It is the one fixed point in this fluctuating world of men and things. "I am the Captain of my soul," and he doesn't forget it for a moment. Too self reliant? Perhaps, but infinitely to be desired above the anaemic rabble of insect men, who whine over their lives and charge their incompetency and spinelessness to fate or to the world about them.

Most of us are slaves to the existing order of things and the little finger of custom is thicker than our loins. But look back over your history and see if it is not the men who believed in the individual, who believed in the integrity of their own motives, who had a profound faith in their own capacities, who having heard the call of their age admitted it into the spring of their action and went forth to answer it with a sublime faith in their own ability to answer it, who have moulded and shaped and reformed the world after a divine pattern. You remember how Emerson puts it: "Let us affront and reprimand the smooth mediocrity and squalid contentment of the times and hurl in the face of custom and trade and office, the fact which is the upshot of all history, that there is a great responsible Thinker and Actor moving wherever moves a man; that a true man belongs to no other time or place, but is the center of things. The man must be so much that he must make all circumstances indifferent, put all means into the shade. Every true man is a cause, a country, an age; requires infinite spaces and numbers and time fully to accomplish his thought—and posterity seems to follow in his footsteps as a procession. A man Caesar is born, and for ages we have a Roman empire. Christ is born, and millions of minds so grow and cleave to his genius that he is confounded with virtue and the possible of man. An institution is the lengthened shadow of one man; as the Reformation, of Luther; Quakerism, of Fox; Methodism, of Wesley; Abolition, of Clarkson. Scipio, Milton called the Height of Rome, and all history resolves itself into the biography of a few stout and earnest persons."

The Moral Might of the Individual

Does our own time need anything so much as this supreme confidence of men in the moral might of the individual? Do we lack anything in these unstable days so much as men who are sane in their judgments, men who cannot be frightened from their calm poise by the roar of the multitude or the crack of political and social whips? We need men who are not crouching in their attitude, with ear bent to the ground to determine on which direction their own interest is moving or the popular mood is tending, but who, believing in the divine right of a man to his own high calling and destiny, stand square upon the earth, with brow to the stars, and fight for the right as God gives to see the right, till the victory is won, or the hungry sod drinks the last drop of their blood.

If there ever was a day when independent men are wanted, men who can hold their footing in the swirl of conflicting and confusing currents that threaten to overthrow all moral values and overwhelm the conscience of the public, that day is now. Organized wickedness, secure in power, was never more brazen and impudent than it is today. We need men who can see and dare and decide in this moral welter of things, and who can become fixed pillars of moral power and steadfastness. We need fearless men who cannot be flattered nor forced from the path of duty; self-reliant men, who believe in the power of righteousness and in their own indomitable souls. We need men who can gather up in their own fists the floating filaments of moral responsibility and of moral might and weld them into a strong force that hell itself cannot withstand. Do we need faith in God? Yes, but we need more a sturdy faith in the invincible power of consecrated and courageous manhood. It is time that we quit our skulking and cringing before the hosts of organized corruption and of wickedness entrenched in high places, and stood upon our feet to do a valiant battle in the world for the things that are pure and lovely and of good repute.

A Cry For Men

"God give us men! A time like this demands Great hearts, strong minds, true faith and ready hands.

Men whom the lust of office cannot kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who love honor; men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking;

Tall men, sun crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking;
For while the rabble, with its thumb-worn creeds,
Its large pretensions and its little deeds,
Mingles in selfish strife, lo! Freedom weeps.
Wrong rules the land, and waiting Justice sleeps."

The call of the day, men, is not to material success, but to moral steadfastness. That which gives life its value is not its concrete deeds, but its fidelity to duty. It is said that it is impossible in these days to do business or to engage in politics honestly and succeed as a factor in public life. Whether this be true or no, this is certain; that it is impossible to do business or politics dishonestly and succeed as a man. If it be true that there is thus placed before every man of us the choice of moral failure or material success, then let us stand up, in the strength of an honest heart, and be counted among those who "dare to love their country and be poor."

Moral Principle

It is no easy task to stand fast for moral principle in an age snarled and tangled in moral obliquity. The victories that shall save our day will not be wrought out in the limelight, but in the silent struggles of the soul where a man wrestles with his own meanness, in the unmarked conquests of the "nobly brave, who died and made no sign." But the man who believes enough in the ultimate success of righteousness to give himself to it with a fine fidelity, is a victor immortal though he may never gain the shining heights toward which the hosts are pressing, but dies there, with his eyes filled with the smoke of battle and his nostrils choked with the dust of warfare, forgotten on the field while the conquering troops sweep over him.

"One who never turned his back, but marched breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break,
Never dreamed, though right were worsted,
Wrong would triumph,
Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
Sleep to wake."

Oh, for strong minds to think through, with quiet sanity, the problems that harry our age. Oh, for strong hearts that are full of a fine, high courage to face a world of demagogues and grafters and force them to be decent. Oh, for men great enough to fail in a great cause, if need be, that the blood of the faithful may become the seed of a new age. Oh, for men with a spirit that waits not on majorities nor settles questions of righteousness by show of hands, but fights on to the very end, when the odds are hopeless, rather than betray the man's soul in him.

"There is no escape by the river,
There is no flight left by the fen;
We are compassed about by the shiver
Of the night of their marching men.
Give a cheer!
For our hearts shall not give way.
Here's to a dark to-morrow
And here's to a brave today!

"The tale of their hosts is countless,
And the tale of ours a score;
But the palm is naught to the dauntless,
And the cause is more and more.
Give a cheer!
We may die, but not give way.
Here's to a silent to-morrow
And here's to a stout to-day!

"God has said, 'Ye shall fail and perish:
But the thrill ye have felt to-night
I shall keep in my heart and cherish
When the worlds have passed in night.'
Give a cheer!
For the soul shall not give way.
Here's to a greater to-morrow
That is born of a great to-day.

"Now shame on the craven truckler
And the puling things that mope!
We've a rapture for our buckler
That outwears the wings of hope.
Give a cheer!
For our joy shall not give way.
Here's in the teeth of to-morrow
To the glory of to-day."

THE first theft Jed ever committed was an infinitesimal triangle out of a pie that was to be the piece de resistance when there was company for dinner. The berry stain on his lips gave him away, and they had the laugh on Jed, which always hurt him worse than a spanking.

His second theft was that of a silver dime out of a till in the tool chest, very likely all there had been in the family cash box for many a week. There was a certain little red heifer in the McCormick herd that came to drink at the ford upon which the heart of Jed had set itself, and he stole this money with the view of buying that heifer. It never occurred to him that so little money might not be a full equivalent for so little a heifer and, when he had watched his chance, had slipped away and trudged two miles down the creek to McCormick's, only to fail of his negotiations and be fetched home at a gallop behind McCormick, clinging to the saddle for dear life lest he bounce off, the laugh was on Jed again and, this time, the whole neighborhood joined in it. Somehow the enormity of the sin did not oppress him as did the enormity of the punishment. Being laughed at was such an anguish that, for long after, he ran and hid in the brush whenever a neighbor came to the farm.

Jed's third theft was a Hubbard squash, which his soul loved when baked, but which the bugs had eaten up in the home garden. Being at a neighbor's he spotted one not too big for him to carry, watched his chance and slipped out of sight carrying the prize in his arms. When Jed's mother next met the neighbor and thanked her for the squash she protested that she had never sent any, and the crime was out. This time Jed was severely talked to and the lesson sufficed for some years, or until he went to town to live and fell into companionship with Herb Pomeroy.

Herb was a year or two older than Jed, fully a head taller and ever so much stronger and more sophisticated. He had a mobile face and his cheeks seemed ~~un- to~~ to be fastened to the cheek bones at all. Anyhow, he could twist his features into any shape he wished. He could assume the solemnity of the judge on the bench, the innocence of the little maid just home from school, the leering mockery of Mephistopheles, with lightning like rapidity, and he could fit the mood to the semblance as readily as the semblance to the mood. The woman who bought a monkey that she might study human nature at close range had no advantage over the mother of Herb Pomeroy.

York was a hundred miles and more from the nearest steamboat or railway, and the Civil War was raging in the height of its ferocity. Everything that could be used a second time had a commercial value. The newspapers, received in exchange for The Ajax, were saleable at the stores for wrapping paper. Bottles, horse shoes, copper bottoms off old boilers and tea-kettles, malleable iron in any form, carpet rugs, paper rags, black walnuts in the fall and wild grapes and plums in late summer, all were sources of income if they could be had, and Jed, under Herb Pomeroy's tutelage, soon found that they could be had if they were not nailed down or boxed up.

Jed had wants, or began to have them soon after reaching York. On the farm he had none that he could not supply himself. If he got hungry for candy he could boil down some sorghum molasses and make some, for his father made all the sorghum mills in the country round about and took a part of his pay, if he ever got any pay at all (which he did not always), in barrels of molasses. But Jed found that that was not as licking good as the brittle and yet sticky horehound bars that crunched under his teeth, that he could buy at Casterline's if he had the money. Jed wanted a pocket knife, a spur and a pistol, fishing tackle, tops and balls, marbles and what not.

Now Jed's father never suspected these growing wants. He was thankful enough if he could give his family their daily bread, cover their nakedness and shield them from the inclemency of the weather. Only once in all the years since he had had a family had he indulged himself with that in which they could not share. In his early manhood in New York he had been something of a smoker. Called away to the state capital to attend a convention the desire came upon him to smoke and, yielding to it, he bought a ten cent cigar, lighted it and started out for a walk to beguile his loneliness at being away from his home. Then he thought of that home, of the family on the verge of poverty, and he buying tobacco with his money only to burn it up under his nose. He took his cigar from his mouth, ground it under his heel in the gutter and never again offended against good conscience by indulging himself in that which he could not share with wife and children.

How could such a man suspect or understand the temptations that beset Jed, newly come to a small town, that town the particular creation of the evil one, at a time when every bit of junk was saleable and every dealer was so anxious to secure the commodities of trade that, no matter what suspicions might be entertained, no disagreeable questions were likely to be asked? How could such a man divine the snares set for the feet of Jed, the more especially as Jed had the bland, the innocent, the exemplary Sunday-school-attending Herb Pomeroy for guide, philosopher and friend? He could not, and he did not. He was the last to learn, what everybody else long had known, that Jed was foreordained some day to dangle from some low-hanging limb with his boots on.

Old Sam and Old Porter were rival blacksmiths and maintained rival shops at rival ends of the one street that ran from river to bluff. They were hard put to it for malleable iron and second-hand horse shoes, not worn so thin that new calks could not be welded on for further use. Jed, among other boys of the band, undertook to supply the demand. It was said of the boys of York that if their listening ears, ever on the alert, detected from the footfalls of a passing horse the fact that a shoe was loose they would follow that horse until the shoe came off and make the prize their own, but this was an exaggeration. However, if any shoe did come off any horse it was useless for the owner to seek to find a place in which to secrete the shoe that it might be nailed on again. Jed, or one of his companions, would be sure to recover it for the behoof of Old Porter or Old Sam, and right glad they were to get them. Every such horseshoe was worth to the lucky finder a little, green, ten cent "shinplaster."

What candy, what ice cream, what pistols, spurs, knives, tops and balls did not Jed provide himself! Not all these conquests were wholly contraband, for, for sweeping the office and keeping the outside stairway clean, Jed was to have the old papers. These he earned, sometimes before they had been read, and with their proceeds he accounted for such of his possessions as were obvious and allowable, but seldom had so slight a foundation served for so considerable an accumulation.

When in after years Jed saw hundreds of boys in prison or reform schools with charges of burglary over against their names, and calling to mind the barn windows he had climbed through, the sheds and outbuildings he had ransacked as they had, he thanked his stars that his youth was spent under primitive conditions when reform schools were unheard of and jails were only for horse thieves or murderers.

The boys of Jed's band used to give and take dares to see which could do the bravest and most cunning deeds of petty lawlessness, not infrequently at the suggestion of Herb Pomeroy, although that prudent person was accesssory, if at all, only at a safe distance. One of the test "tricks" was taken by Jed, the other by Hank Woodley.

Hard pressed for old iron or horseshoes, both of these lads had done some good turns by stealing from one of the blacksmiths and selling to the other, but it was left for Jed to sell Old Porter his own horseshoes before his own eyes. For prudential reasons Old Porter kept his pile of shoes at the foot of his anvil block so that he might have them under surveillance. He had his suspicions. Jed had accumulated a handful of rejected shoes, rejected because worn too thin at the toes, but he had two or three good ones. The better to carry them he strung them on a wire. Old Porter wore glasses over which he peered at the boys when they came with plunder, but through which he did not see clearly when out of focus. Jed inveigled him to his own pile of shoes to look at his assortment, but, as Old Porter reached out his hand to take them, Jed let go of one end of the wire and the whole assortment slid off onto Old Porter's own pile. Apparently much perturbed, Jed dropped upon hands and knees and gathered the shoes up again, with the difference that, in place of the bad ones, he gathered up merchantable shoes from Old Porter's heap. The shoes were accepted, the shinplasters were counted out and Jed and his cronies feasted on watermelons galore back of the livery barn. His primacy in the gang was undisputed for more than a week, or until Hank Woodley scored his best.

Hank's triumph was with bottles. The leading grocer made vinegar in barrels in a shed back of his store. In the bung of each barrel he thrust an inverted, long necked bottle to keep the dirt out. The day was warm, ice cream at a premium and the gang's treasury flat. Under the office stairs a consultation was held and the knowledge of those bottles was divulged. Jed dared Hank to swipe those bottles from the back of the store and sell them at the front, and Hank was not a lad to reject a dare. He watched his chance to slip into the shed unobserved and passed the bottles one by one through a hole in the wall to Jed waiting in the alley, the bottles were rolled in the dust of the street, placed in a gunny-bag, taken into the front door of the store and sold to their unsuspecting owner for cash, and Jed's primacy was no longer undisputed.

That there was anything wrong in such transactions neither Jed nor his companions ever considered. That there was danger of getting caught, and of getting "strap oil" if caught, they well knew from sad experience, but prosperous petty theft was looked upon by them all as a rare good joke on the victim. They were as unconscious of sin as the linnet that gets the cherries or the hawk that takes a chicken from the barnyard. What was taken in severalty was generally shared in common with entire unselfishness.

And during these two or three bad years Jed's financial credit was of the best. There was not a store in town that would not trust him for any trifle he wanted, for he always paid his debts when he said he would and, although he probably told a hundred lies a day, his word was as good as any man's bond if given in pledge of specific performance. He was shy and not brazen, respectful and never saucy. If his delinquencies were innumerable his lack of consciousness of their sinful quality prevented any deep rutted demoralization of character. So far as Jed ever knew, of all that gang of six or eight, only Hank Woodley developed other than upright citizenship, and as for Herb Pomeroy, he became one of the successful promoters of the rapidly developing west, rich, respected and exemplary, spending a term or two in congress.

But it was not always to be so. There came a time when Jed's consciousness of the sinfulness of sin became poignant and, strangely enough, through the instrumentality of his friend the horsethief, Monroe Scranton.

Monroe was Sid Chapman's wife's brother and he had taken a claim back from the Serpentine in the rolling hills and without very much level land on it. He had built a diminutive cabin which he little occupied, for he worked on the farms around or trafficked in horses in preference to improving his farm. Everybody said that there was no harm in Monroe. He had no bad habits but worked irregularly, spent his money foolishly and swapped horses too much to ever become fore-handed, had a new horse nearly every time he was "met up with" on the road. Medium height, light hair, blue eyes and perhaps thirty years old, careless and carefree, loving a good joke and a hearty laugh, such was Jed's fast friend, the horsethief.

A great many things came up missing on the Serpentine during the years that Monroe lived there. Cows lost their bells, picket ropes disappeared, axes could not be found and children were spanked for having lost them, whips and harness, monkey wrenches and double-trees, sets of harness and even plows left at the ends of furrows in the fields, mysteriously disappeared. What could the matter be? Not one person in that community of God-fearing men could be suspected.

Monroe used to make frequent trips to "The River" where the larger towns were, always returning with a new horse, sometimes with a new buggy, new harness or something or other for stock in trade and, if one met him on the road, he was certain to be bantered for a swap and, first and last, there was hardly a farmer on the Serpentine who had not had a horse, a mule, a cow or two, a spring wagon or a single buggy from Monroe's Scranton, shiftless, good-natured, sunny-tempered Monroe, who was ready to lend a hand for a few days to any farmer needing help, but was little disposed to steady employment with anyone. He confessed to being too big a coward to go to the war and avoided the draft by skipping the country.

Among others he worked for Jed's uncle, who also was a lover of good horses and had had more than one from Monroe. But there was one that he got elsewhere that Monroe greatly admired. She could pace a mile in three minutes, which was fast time in those days, turn around and trot it back again in the same time. This made her the most noted animal in the whole country round about. Monroe tried again and again to trade for her, but Jed's Uncle liked her well enough to keep her himself inasmuch as the joy of throwing dust in other people's eyes on the highroad was to be valued beyond mere lucre in any amount that Monroe could muster.

Monroe went to "The River," and had been gone several days when this mare became missing from Uncle's pasture. She was hard to catch when loose, was disposed to leap low fences and was so well known that, it was thought, no one would dare to steal her. In two or three days Monroe came back from "The River" with a span of new horses. He had made a quick trip. He went to work for Uncle again in the hayfield with his new team. He even rode a day or two in searching for the missing mare, but she could not be found. Monroe grieved over her loss more than Uncle, for he declared he had traded for the new team with full expectation of getting a trade out of Uncle for "Crooked Legged Kate," as the mare was called.

Months went by, perhaps nearly a year, when some stranger in town, talking about horses, boasted of a sorrel mare over in his county that could out-pace and out-trot anything in the country for money. She was a marvel. He was questioned closely and, nothing loath, word was sent by Monroe's Scranton to Jed's Uncle telling him where this wonderful mare could be found, and Monroe delivered the message faithfully. The chances were a hundred to one that it was his mare, Monroe declared, and he offered to go after it, but Jed's Uncle concluded to go himself and Jed's father went along to keep him company and help identify the horse, for Jed's father was the squire and knew the law. It was fifty or sixty miles anyhow from the Serpentine. Monroe was to stay at Jed's Uncle's and take care of the stock and help husk the corn while Uncle was gone.

That was when Jed and his cousin had the greatest fun of their lives kicking Monroe's Scranton out of bed. They slept three in a bed, Jed being allowed to pass the first night at Uncle's while the men were gone after the missing mare. Jed and his cousin awoke first. It was time to be up. Monroe slept on the front side and was lying asleep perilously near the edge of the bed. Jed and cousin got around with their backs to the wall, put their feet against Monroe, straightened their legs with all their might, both at once, and out Monroe went kerplunk onto the floor. Then followed a pillow fight not likely soon to be forgotten. After breakfast Monroe saddled up his best horse and took Jed home, riding behind him, visited his sister, said good-bye and made off toward town. Nothing more was seen of Monroe for three years.

In a day or two more Jed's father and Uncle returned with the mare. The identification of the mare in advance of seeing her was perfect and, what was more to the point, the identification of Monroe's Scranton as the person from whom the luckless possessor had purchased the mare was not less so. His trip to "The River," notwithstanding its unusual quickness, had served the double purpose of relieving his employer of a valued horse and himself of all suspicion.

The discovery of the culprit got into the papers and became the talk of the county, and of adjacent counties, too, almost of the state, with the unfortunate result that first one and then another stranger from heaven knows where came to the Serpentine to claim a horse or a mule, a cow or a wagon, a buggy or a set of harness that had been stolen. The Serpentine came to be looked upon as a veritable repository for stolen property. Men were afraid to start to town with a team through fear that one or both horses might be claimed before they got home, and people began to say that those men on the Serpentine could not be any better than they ought to be or else they might have suspected that all was not right. Their shamefacedness was pitiful. Sid Chapman sold out for a song and moved away on his wife's account because the other women on the Serpentine managed somehow or other to "throw up to her" something of her brother's fault every time she met one of them.

Now that the character of Monroe had come out the men folks made a pilgrimage to his cabin, tore up the floor and tore down the ceiling and, either overhead or underneath, they found half the articles that had been lost in the community in a half dozen years.

Surmising that Monroe would sooner or later communicate with his sister, whom he dearly loved, and whose saddle pony, a present from Monroe, was one of the earliest horses retrieved by its owner, who lived half a hundred miles away, she was told to warn him that if he ever came back within reach they would hang him to the first tree they could get him to. He failed to get the word, was ignorant of what had transpired meantime and, being sure that he could fix it up with Uncle if he should be caught, ventured back into the vicinity, to see his sister, but through the blackjack country after three years spent in Colorado. He was seen and recognized, a posse from town started in pursuit and he was overhauled and brought to York two summers after Jed had moved to town and when Jed was in the height of his own reprisals upon portable properties. Monroe was lodged in the county jail.

The county jail was only a little way from Jed's home. It was of stone, had one room, a heavily grated door and two little barred windows so high up that Jed could only reach the bars, but by digging his toes in he could climb up and sit precariously on the stone ledge. This he did the first morning after Monroe's arrival. "Hello, Monroe!" he called. "Hello, Jed!" was the response and Monroe reached his hand through the bars and patted the boy on his bare head.

"Sorry you're in jail, Monroe," Jed ventured. "Sorry I am, too, Jed," was the response. "but I reckon I deserve it. Do you ever 'hook' anything, Jed?" Monroe demanded to know, stroking Jed's hair affectionately.

"Uh-huh, sometimes," was Jed's confession.

"Watermelons, Jed?"

"Uh-huh, but mostly horse shoes, bottles, paper rags and things that will sell."

"Don't they never catch you at it, Jed?"

"Naw! Not unless some of the other fellers blab."

"Are you thinking of stealing horses by and by, Jed, after you've grown up?"

"Humph-mh," was Jed's reply, "they hang people for horse stealing."

"That's so, Jed," Monroe admitted, leaning heavily against the wall and coming close to Jed so that he could speak in a whisper. "Yes, that's so, Jed, and do you know that they are going to hang me, tonight or tomorrow night, anyhow, before they get through with me."

A lump arose in Jed's throat and he moved as if to get down.

"Don't go yet, Jed, I've got something I want to say to you," Monroe pleaded. "Jed, I'm your friend. Do you remember that morning when you boys kicked me out of bed and we had a pillow fight? Do you remember when I fired the lime kiln for your father and how we saw little niggers making jackknives when we peeped in where it was hottest?"

"Naw! They weren't making jackknives. They'd have all burnt up."

"Do you remember, Jed, what I told you about hell being like that in there where the fire burned until everything was red hot, only that hell was bigger than all the world, and the sky and the stars and a hundred times hotter than it was in there where it was the hottest? Do you remember that, Jed?"

"Uh-huh? And you nearly scairt the wits out of me, too."

"Well, Jed, that's where I'm going when they make me stretch hemp. I suppose I ort to. I've been bad. I've lived mostly by horse stealing. I thought I was dreadful cunnin', don't yer know, and that they'd never catch me at it, but I made a mistake in stealing old crooked legged Kate. I might have known that her smart points would give me away, and you see they've got me, but I never killed nobody, Jed. I swear to that, and that I might not be tempted to, I never carried no gun. I made up my mind to take my medicine if I ever had to without fighting back. You see, Jed, if I stole a man's horse he could get another, but if I took his life it was all up with him, he couldn't get any other, so, honest Injun, I never hurt nobody. I haven't any life but my own to answer for."

"What made you come back, Monroe? You knew they'd be after you," Jed inquired.

"Because I wanted to see my sister. She was all I had in the world and had been like a mother to me and I couldn't hear nothing from her. I don't know now where she moved to."

"Went to Californy, they say," ventured Jed.

"Hope she went so far that she'll never hear of this," was the response, and Monroe leaned upon his arm and his frame shook as the tears fell from his eyes. "I hope she'll never hear of this."

By this time Jed was crying, too, and again he moved as if to get down from his uneasy perch, but Monroe reached a hand through the bars and caught him by the shoulder. "Don't go yet, Jed, there's something more I want to say to you. Don't 'hook' things. Don't do it any more. I began that way when I was a boy and I couldn't quit it. I began with watermelons. Nobody thought there was any harm in hooking watermelons if you didn't tear up the vines. From watermelons I went to robbing hens' nests, and then to chickens and whatever there was handy, and when I grew up I took anything I could lay my hands on, and, finally, horses and mules, and I've rustled cattle, too. Here I am, Jed, about to swing from a limb at the end of a rope."

"And you've got such a good father!" Monroe went on, "but I had a good father, too, who lived and died never suspecting what I was up to. Likely everybody else knew it but him and he needed to know worse than anybody. Does your father know, Jed, that you 'hook' things?"

"No, are you going to tell on me?"

"Not if you will promise me, man to man, honest Injun, cross your heart in sacred honor, hope to die if you do, that you won't hook things any more. I stole salt pork out of your father's outside cellar down on the creek, most half a barrel of it, and perhaps I'm doing something now for him to make it up. Promise me that you won't, Jed, never hook another thing as long as you live. Won't you? You see what it has brought me to."

By this time Jed was dissolved in tears and he promised, crossed his heart and shook hands on it. Monroe drew his face down to the bars and implanted a kiss upon Jed's forehead and just then a crowd of officers and men came to take Monroe to Jed's father's court for a preliminary examination. Court was held, the crowd was so large, in the largest hall in the town over The Ajax printing office. Jed followed and stowed himself away in a back corner where he could see and hear, but out of his father's sight.

The trial was a brief one. Monroe confessed to having stolen crooked legged Kate, but declared that to be the only horse he had ever stolen and that he had come back to make good to the man he had wronged for the harm done. He said he had lived an honest life since then, swinging a sledge and holding a drill in the mines of Colorado, in testimony of which he pointed to his calloused palms. Jed's father questioned him about the other horses brought into the Serpentine neighborhood and traded to the farmers, horses that had since been replevined by their rightful owners. Monroe then knew for the first time that the whole business was out, and he confessed all, telling where each horse asked about came from. There were some who wanted to stop the inquiry there through fear, as Jed's father afterward intimated, that next thing Monroe might be telling where the horses came from that he had traded to them and that they still had. Monroe was bound over and remanded to jail to answer to the district court that would convene a fortnight hence. The sheriff took his prisoner back to the little jail, but the crowd remained. No sooner was the sheriff safely out of hearing than Old Rossmore arose and said: "Court's adjourned, hain't it, Squire?"

Jed's father replied that it was.

"Then you'll be excused, Squire, from further attendance," Old Rossmore went on, "you've done your duty."

"I guess I'll stay," said Jed's father.

"It's at your own risk, then," was the rejoinder, "we kept mum till you did your duty, now we'll do our'n. I'm chairman of this meeting and it is moved and seconded that Monroe Scranton stretch hemp and that he do it tonight."

"Before that question is put," said Jed's father, "I want to be heard. That boy came of good family. There is good stuff in him. He needed to be brought up with a short turn, but not at the end of a rope. That won't help him. Time was when we had no state prison fit to keep criminals in. Now we have. The hanging of Branch and Dixon and the shooting of Langworthy didn't stop horse stealing. Hanging Monroe Scranton won't. There is a civilized way to deal with such culprits and it is time for us to be civilized. Monroe Scranton has confessed. He will do the same when court convenes in two weeks. He can't escape. The court will give him ten years in prison and when he comes out more than likely he will come out to be a decent citizen. Anyhow, that will give him time to prepare his soul to meet his God. I will prefer a charge of murder against any man who lifts a hand to lynch that boy." Turning to Old Rossmore, Jed's father said warningly, "I want to say to you that you are handling a two-edged sword without a hilt and it is just as likely to cut in your direction as any other."

Old Rossmore sprang to his feet and demanded to know what Jed's father meant. He was answered that he meant what he said and that Old Rossmore would do well to go slow.

Elder Harford then took the floor and pleaded for the lawful execution of the law. A few others spoke declaring that if an example was not made of Monroe no man's horse would be safe and that Jed's father might prefer all the charges he wanted to but that no jury would convict anybody of anything, and it might prove mighty unhealthy to edit papers if anything was said or done to prevent the execution of summary justice. After two hours or more of hot blooded discussion, and Elder Harford had offered a most moving prayer, despite all that Old Rossmore could do, the vote was overwhelmingly in favor of letting the law take its course. Jed's father ordered the sheriff to double-guard the jail that night and the crowd went home.

Jed slipped out at the first opportunity and ran as fast as his legs could carry him to take the good news to Monroe: "They ain't going to hang you, Monroe," he called, "they are going to have you sent to state prison instead so that you can come out a better man."

"Who wanted to hang me?" Monroe asked.

"Old Rossmore, the most, and two or three men from the Serpentine—Blackman, Morse and Jennings."

"Yes, they've got horses that hain't been claimed yet, and, as for Old Rossmore, he found a market for nearly half the horses I stole and if the sheriff will inspect the hickory thicket up the gulch back of his corral he'll find new horses there two or three times a week," declared Monroe with bitterness, then added, "They'll do it tonight, Jed, nothing ain't going to stop 'em. If I should live to tell all I know in court they'd lose more'n you think."

Just then the guards came and drove Jed away, but a little later he slipped back with a pie his mother had given him, at his request, to take to Monroe for his supper. The guards drove him away again, but not until Monroe and Jed had exchanged hearty good-nights.

That evening the town was deserted. The men had all driven home. Two guards were on duty at the jail door. Jed's father and the sheriff saw to it that all was well, and they went home and went to bed and the town, the sheriff and Jed's father slept undisturbed.

Next morning Jed bounced out of bed. The sun was just rising brightly and only few were astir, although wreaths of smoke were bursting from many chimneys. Jed was up before his father and, quickly slipping on his trousers, pattered barefooted to the jail. The guards were gone. Jed grasped the bars, dug his toes in where the rough-hewn stones gave opportunity and mounted the window ledge. "Hello, Monroe!" he called. He strained his eyes to see if Monroe was sleeping on the little iron cot in the corner. It was vacant. On the floor, inside upward, a few feet from the wall, lay Monroe's white slouch hat, but where was Monroe? The sunbeams straggled in at the little window opposite striking the floor so far over toward Jed's side as to leave the farther side of the room in shadow, but gradually Jed's eyes adjusted themselves to the murk and he saw stretched out upon the stone floor the sprawling form of a man. His face was as black as that of any negro and, hanging from his throat like a four-in-hand, was perhaps two feet of rope. Jed dropped from his perch and ran home white as a sheet, eyes brimming, dashed into the house and called to his father, "They've hanged Monroe!"

"What, boy!" Jed's father demanded, "You don't mean it! That is Old Rossmore's work, the old scoundrel, trying to cover up his own tracks. There will be more trouble before this is through with." There was, but that is another story, save to say that Old Rossmore left the country between two days and was never seen or heard of after.

The guards were taken unawares, they said, by a crowd of men wearing masks who threw them to the ground, bound their hands and gagged their mouths, forced the door with muffled bars, took Monroe Scranton out and started with him for the timber on the river bank. A wagon appeared, drawn by two blanketed horses, with a goods box in the rear end. From this to stand on a rope was fastened around a far stretching limb and a noose at the other end was slipped around the neck of Monroe, who was compelled to mount the box. When all was ready Monroe was asked if he had anything to say before swinging off. "Drive on," he said, and he kicked the box out from under his own feet while the others were leading the horses away. Not once did he whimper, plead or whine, but he seemed to be the coolest man in the party.

When they had made sure that he was dead they took back to the jail the remains of Monroe Scranton and left them sprawling on the stone floor.

Jed had learned his lesson. For many a day that blackened visage and shred of rope haunted him sleeping and waking.

Walker Hines, railroad authority and expert on rapid transportation, tells a story of an Irishman who traveled with the greatest speed ever recorded. The Irishman was down on his luck and needed a lodging-place. After asking the loan of a bed in several houses in a small western town, he encountered a preacher, who told him: "There's an unoccupied house down the road a little way. You might sleep there. But I am going to warn you that the house is haunted." "No matter," replied the Irishman, "I'm not afraid of ghosts." Soon after dark the preacher dropped in to see how the Irishman was faring and found him preparing to sleep in the house, but a trifle nervous. Three days later he saw coming down the road the weary and dusty figure of the former tenant of the ghost-ridden house. "Why, where have you been?" he inquired kindly. "What have you been doing during the three days since you went into that house?" "All that time," replied the Irishman, "I've been coming back."—Popular Magazine.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The State Dairy Bureau

Under the laissez faire idea of government there would be no need for a State Dairy Bureau. Each consumer of dairy products would look out for himself and each producer of dairy products would look out for himself. The producer would be free to mix oleomargarine with his butter, to fortify his milk with indigestible preservatives and to be as untidy as his own gorge would stand it for him to be. His customers would have to take their chances in finding out what dairyman is clean and what one is honest, what ones it would be safe to patronize and what ones it would not.

It may be said in passing that no greater crimes have been committed against the well-being of human kind than have been committed by dairymen, partly through selfishness and partly through culpable carelessness and equally culpable ignorance. Babies by the hundred thousands, yes, by the million, have been poisoned to their deaths from this cause, and other thousands and tens of thousands have fallen by typhoid contracted through dairy products, while larcenies beyond computation have been committed in short weight, short measure and excess of water and the use of spurious ingredients. These are hard charges to be preferred but they are true.

Now the safeguarding of society against such delinquencies is paternalism in government against which we hear so much, but of which we are destined to know so much more as civilization advances and human life comes to be more highly valued. The state will have more arms than any windmill, more fingers than any cotton gin, and its arms will reach out, its hands grasp and its fingers will meddle regulatively in so many of the affairs of life as to endanger all freedom of action, all initiative, all self responsibility of the citizen. Where to draw that line betwixt governmental interference and personal freedom the wisest do not yet know.

The California State Dairy Bureau is rather a new arm of state interference in private affairs for the public good, dating only from 1897, and falling very far short of the ultimate needs of the state, for, by and by, California is not unlikely to become the greatest dairy state in the Union and to ship its commodities all over the world. It will then be all the more necessary to see to it that our dairy products are beyond suspicion that the market for them may not be impaired by unscrupulous persons to the hurt of the whole.

At present the bureau consists of three persons who serve without pay, except actual and necessary traveling expenses, and their business is to superintend and be responsible for the activities of certain subordinates such as a secretary and six or seven paid inspectors. The expenditures of the bureau are now limited to $12,500 a year.

Here are some of the things that these agents of the State Dairy Bureau are required to do:

Enforce the general laws preventing the sale of milk or milk products from diseased cows or unsatisfactory dairies or factories for the manufacture of dairy products.

Enforce the laws preventing adulteration of milk and dairy products.

Prevent the use of chemical preservatives, thickening material and coloring matter.

Prevent the use of inaccurate testing apparatus and to test with accuracy testing apparatus in use.

To compel the branding of all cheese made in California as full cream, half skim or wholly skim cheeses.

To register and issue state brands to producers of cheese.

Prevent the manufacture and sale of renovated butter without a license and collect the fees for the same.

Prevent the misbranding of butter with brands of persons other than the real maker of the same.

Prevent the sale of substitutes for butter and cheese unless the purchaser is advised by proper labeling of the exact character of what he is purchasing.

To gather statistics in relation to the dairy industry and disseminate the same.

This would seem to be a fairly liberal array of duties to be performed for a great state at no greater cost than $12,500 a year. Manifestly the service must be seriously inadequate in a state that produces anyhow fifty million pounds of butter and five million pounds of cheese a year. What will that bureau be when the state's present production is multiplied by ten, as it certainly will be in the fullness of time if alfalfa is to do the redemptive work hoped for in the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys?

Of course the state's work of dairy inspection is quite a little aided by what the several cities do in the same line, although city inspection relates more to the milk supply than to anything else. An important branch of this work is that of educating our dairy population in methods of integrity, cleanliness and efficiency as well as in detecting fraud. Still, there will always be much for a State Dairy Bureau to do if the consuming public is to be safeguarded and a great industry fostered for the common welfare. The State Dairy Bureau has a right to exist.

When a King Travels

The other day King George, Queen Mary and their children took a little trip from London to Balmoral castle, a distance somewhat longer than from San Francisco to Los Angeles. Here is a list of the vehicles, etc., that were deemed essential to move them: Two locomotives (which, it must be admitted, should be enough to move even a king and queen unless they are unusually portly), the queen's private car, Queen Alexandra's private car, two private cars for Princess Mary and her attendants, a private car for the other children and their attendants, four cars for other servants and railroad officials, two baggage cars (for, of course, the royal family must take along something to wear); twelve cars in all. Thus it will be seen that when royalty moves some pomp and circumstance attends it. And, after all, they reached their destination no more safely and securely than does one of the "common people" when he purchases a ticket to his trading town, gets on the train and gets off when he gets there.

"The proudest boast of the old-time robber barons was that they never robbed a poor man." "Those fellows were amateurs at the game," explained the great Captain of Industry, "and didn't understand how much money there was in it."—Puck.

Walter Macarthur

THIS PAPER WILL NOT ADVISE a voter to do what the editor of it would not do if he were in that voter's place. If he lived in the Fourth congressional district of California he would vote for Walter Macarthur for congress, despite the fact that said editor is a Republican. Democrat though he is, Walter Macarthur will be found fighting for more things that progressive Republicanism will be fighting for than will his opponent. He will not go with his party when his party goes wrong. He will not go against the Republican party when that party goes right, and he has as clear a vision of what is right and what is wrong as any man California has ever honored with the right to represent it in the halls of congress. If the reader of this would know more of this man and what he stands for he is invited to read a pen picture of him to be found on an inside page. He is every inch a Man.

What Might Have Been

THEODORE V. HALSEY PROVED a short horse soon whitewashed. No fault is here found with trial or verdict. The expected happened. Perhaps, under the rules of the game, nothing else could, but if that jury had been free to render such a verdict as was in its heart to render it would probably have read substantially like this: "We, the jury, find that Halsey paid the members of the boodle board the sums alleged to have been paid; that they were out for stuff; that he could not get what his corporation wanted without paying for it and therefore we find him not guilty of paying for it." In so finding the jury would have represented the average moral sense of the people of San Francisco on the subject of grafting, and that is a main reason why no convictions can be had. Halsey is guilty, the corporation he represented is guilty, and the guilt of all is shared with a public sentiment particeps criminis. Even those who both see and know what is right are tired, dead tired, capable of sorrow but scarcely of indignation.

Malpractice

AS LONG AS THERE ARE MEN and women in the world some men will betray and some women will fall and, to cover their sin, will yield up their lives on the operating tables of abortionists. The man who procures the abortion to be performed is accessory before the fact and a principal criminal. Abortion and boodling have this in common, a miserable concept in the public mind that it is justified by necessity lest a worse thing come upon one, viz., the loss of caste by having the cry of an infant heard in the house. Better death, murder, better anything than that! That is the attitude of the minds of the many. It is abominable. This man Thompson appears to have few friends. Perhaps he can be punished. That will be something.

Do They Read It?

THREE PAGES A DAY for three or four days devoted to Eva Swan! Who reads those pages? Does one in the hundred? The ninety-and-nine run their eyes over the scare heads and the pictures and, saying, "poor girl," turn over the page to see if Theodore has said something or to find the baseball news. The hundredth morbid being who reads the whole spread probably borrows the paper over the back fence or watches his (her) chance to pick up one on the boat where some reader who pays for what he reads has thrown it aside. But who could lay claim to being "journalist" if he failed to "play up" such an incident for "all it is worth?" These gentlemen know as little of journalism as a politician of politics, as little as any one can know without being deprived of his liberty.

Head Up

INJURIES BY AUTOMOBILES have become so uninterestingly frequent that journalism, unless in exceptional cases, disposes of them in "stickfuls" instead of half pages with pictures. In a little while they will be relegated to three-line incidents in remote corners. One way to avoid so inconspicuous a taking-off is to cross the street with head up and eye on duty. There are a hundred "close shaves" every day in San Francisco, everyone of them due to crossing one of the thoroughfares in a brown study. When the chauffeur happens to be in the same condition, zip—another soul injected into eternity!

The Reason For It

THE CENSUS REPORTS of Pacific Coast cities have been held up that charges of padding may be investigated. Why should the roster of any city be padded and a carbuncle not? Every city is more or less of an ulcer and the bigger the city the bigger the ulcer. Why yearn for bigness? Because it makes our real estate grow richer while we sleep. Tax the unearned increment out of city and town lots and we shall soon see growth of urban population viewed with alarm by every growing city.

Heney At Denver

WHILE AT DENVER Francis J. Heney was invited to address the legislature. The press dispatchers did not think it worth while to tell us what he said, as they did not some time ago that Judge Lindsay had whipped The Beast to "a frazzle," but we may be sure that he made himself understood, that those members of the legislature of Colorado who stand for Right Things took hold with new courage while the cohorts of greed deprecated this "invasion of an outsider," this "stirrer up of strife." The most effective campaigning ever done in the first district of Minnesota, by the way, was done by Francis J. Heney, and the Tawny scalp of Tawney therefore dangles at his belt.

Going Right Along

HIRAM JOHNSON'S CAMPAIGNING through the state is more like an ovation than anything else. He has captured the imaginations of the people and they flock to see and hear him as they would to see and hear Roosevelt or La Follette. His purpose is to finish his job. He did part of it when he led the fight to redeem the Republican party from Herrin control. He will have done the rest when he shall have led to a successful issue the redemption of the state. Then he will clean his desk and proceed with the job of being governor, with justice to all but with special favors to none. That is the Johnsonian ideal.

Why Wallace Is Wanted

A. J. WALLACE IS WANTED for Lieutenant Governor, not because he is a jolly good fellow who can lean up against a bar and make a crowd roar with a story. That is not his style. He is wanted because he is a careful, calculating, shrewd judge of human nature and will know how to so constitute the state senate committees and how conduct the business of that deliberative body as to get the most and best work out of it in the shortest time. And he'll not round up all the off-color legislative mavericks in the bunch, and pen them by themselves as a committee on public morals!

Why Terminal Rates?

The long and short haul issue in transportation has ever been and ever will be a bone of contention until charging less for a long than for a shorter haul shall have been prohibited. Why need it be permitted at all?

It should be no part of the business of a railroad to fetch freight, where time is not the essence of the service, from New York to San Francisco or from San Francisco to New York. With the completion of the Panama canal not one pound of such freight should be carried by rail and it would not have been so carried in the past had it not been for terminal rates with which to kill, not meet, water transportation. The business of railroads should be to take freight at ports and distribute it to the interior, and to fetch freight from the interior to the ports to be taken to other ports. Any other kind of carrying is abnormal and in contravention of sound public policy. The terminal rate works to the injury of seaport cities as well as to the injury of the interior, which is mulcted with high freights to make up for the low rates given terminal points.

The completion of the Panama canal should work a revolution in transportation. It is time to make ready for that revolution, and the best way to make ready for it is to free our ports and their approaches from being bottled by and for the railroad interests.

The report of Commissioner Herbert Knox Smith, lately filed with the President, shows how effectively this bottling process has been prosecuted. He declares that the keeping open of adequate terminals, whereby ship and car may be brought together, any ship and any car, from any railroad or private owner without saying "by your leave," should be made a condition precedent to the expenditure of government moneys upon harbor channels. There is sound sense in the suggestion, for of what public use is a channel if access cannot be had to it except over private, toll-exacting wharves and terminals?

Whatever criticisms may be visited upon railroads they certainly are little chargeable with not having their eyes open to the main chance. Would it not be a good thing to time the enforcement of the long and short haul provision of the interstate commerce law to meet the opening of the Panama canal? That would make San Francisco an actual, rather than a constructive, seaport, and would make waterways realities rather than dreams.

Why Does Not America Lead?

Why do not the American people lead the world in the science and art of government? We began with a clean slate and a boundless opportunity, but we have done little else than copy from the mother country and the nations of Europe. We have taken some hints from Australia and New Zealand, and we have made some progress ourselves, but we have hung back when we should have gone forward, we have followed when we should have led. Is it because we have done no more than necessity compelled and for the reason that the breadth of our continent and its newness made our necessity less compelling?

If this be the explanation of the humiliating phenomenon, why have we led at all in industry and invention, in high finance and in transportation? There has been no internal pressure of a consuming mass against the power of subsistence, and yet our agriculture has not been laggard. We have subdued the forces of nature after a fashion that has been the admiration of the world. It is only when we come to the art of governing that we are put to shame.

We took our legal system from England, but we have maintained it very much as it was in England when we took it, while England has raised that system to a higher state of efficiency than we hardly dare hope for. We must go to the cities of Europe for light on our municipal problems, to the countries of Europe for old age pensions and employers' liability laws, even for industrial education. We lean on Europe for art and music and, to a humiliating degree, for what is best in literature and philosophy, in science and the highest in education. Is it not about time we were standing alone and doing for ourselves?

Is the explanation to be found in the truth that we have been so absorbed in making dollars that we have neglected the profounder concerns of life? It would seem so, and the harvest of our neglect of these profounder concerns has been almost the debauching of our national character.

Are we, at length, coming to ourselves? Are we passing off the plane of gross materialism to a higher plane of real living and real doing? It begins to look like it and, in that beginning, we can almost see the dawning of that political and sociological renaissance that will give joy to the world. We can do it if we put our hands to it.

Trouble Ahead

Mexico is going to make trouble for the United States. The American mind should prepare itself to face the inevitable. Every gale that sweeps up from the south brings to our ears news of the perpetration of some new Mexican atrocity against humanity. We shall not always remain as densely ignorant of Mexico, its people and its government as we have been, and, when the truth shall become known, we shall not tolerate such conditions as there obtain.

Of course we know that Mexico is not fit to be a republic and cannot be one until education and immigration shall have transformed the population into something different from what it is. We shall not quarrel with the powers that be in Mexico because the government of Mexico is not of the people of Mexico, but we have a right to demand that such government shall be for the people of Mexico no matter whom it is of. That it is not, has not been and is getting farther and farther away from being. Never was despotism more pitiless, the greed of the rich more insatiate, the rights of man less recognized and justice more perfectly put to shame than in the Mexico of Porfirio Diaz. The one redeeming feature of his regime is that he has preserved order, but it may be doubted if at less cost to life and property than anarchy might have inflicted.

The Philippines did not come to us of our own seeking. We took them because we had to or flunk. We did not establish our sphere of influence over Cuba because we wanted to, but because we must, and that necessity will not stop this side of annexation and government from Washington. A similar necessity is being forced upon us by Mexico. Every effort will be made to keep Mexico incommunicado, but it will not succeed. American interest has been aroused and the truth will out. The Uncle Tom's Cabin of Mexico will yet be written, if it has not already been, and there will be no withstanding the moral indignation of ninety millions of outraged American citizens. Not Latin America and not Europe can hold back that avalanche.

Nor will Europe seek to hold it back. Europe will add its weight to the compelling force that will make intervention between the people of Mexico and their exploiters inevitable. The Diaz dynasty has added to the cupidity of the malefactor of great wealth the pitilessness of the Indian, and the result will be the forcing of the hand of some national administration as the hand of McKinley was forced in the case of Cuba. The task of the regeneration of Mexico will be no child's play. We should pray that the cup pass from us if it be the will of heaven, nevertheless the will of heaven be done although the United States take upon itself the performance of a duty that may cost thousands of lives and millions of money.

There is trouble ahead, and the American mind should be preparing itself to meet the exigency with determination and power.

Uncle Sam, Ship Owner

American capital can find employment in deep sea carrying by sailing foreign built ships manned by foreign seamen under foreign flags. The spectacle is not one to arouse national pride or beget national enthusiasm for maritime pursuits, but it is preferable to seeing foreign built ships manned by foreign seamen sailing under the American flag. Our present status has the merit of being without pretense, while the other thing would be a national lie.

The rehabilitation of the American marine cannot be except Uncle Sam pay out of the common treasury the perennial deficiencies arising from doing a losing business. That is what ship-subsidy means and the American people hate the word subsidy however employed.

The United States government is successfully operating a line of steamships between Atlantic seaports and Colon. We are asking the United States government to operate a similar line between Seattle and Panama. It ought to do it.

The United States government needs many merchantmen as auxiliaries in the event of war. As part return for subsidies paid it is proposed that aided ships be available for government use in time of war.

Now if the United States government can operate successfully a line of steamers between New York and Colon it can operate another line from New York to Rio Janeiro and Buenos Ayres; and if it can operate a line between Seattle and Panama it can operate others between Seattle and Valparaiso, San Francisco and Sydney, or wherever they would be operated under subsidy. Why may not therefore Uncle Sam supply himself with such auxiliary steamships as may be needed in the event of war and make them earn their keep, meantime, by carrying mails and developing commerce as subsidized ships might do? It could be scarcely less economical, it might be more efficient and it would obviate that tendency to special privilege that is putting the American people out of patience with subsidies of whatever nature.

The idea is worth thinking on.

Now We Know

It is a dull comprehension that cannot now read the political signs of the times. Saratoga settled it. The Republican party has been rejuvenated. Once again it is to be the progressive party of America. Three several times the Democratic party tried to lead but could not do it. It was not in it to lead and it did not have the man. Mr. Bryan did his best but he had not the vital force and he was handicapped by traditions that should have ended at Appomattox. It was left to the Lion Hunter to speak to the people that they go forward. They are on the march. The revolution is none the less complete for being bloodless. "March on, march on to victory or death," death to the world's hope of a government and social order that shall put man above property and the rights of man above mere legalities.

Not all Republicans will be able to keep step with the march of progress. We may be sure that most of those burdened with much spoil will not. Wall street will not. Morgan and Rockefeller will not. The "interests" generally will not. The Democratic party will open its ranks to receive all these. While it is doing this, great hosts of Democratic youth and yeomanry will march over into the Republican party to stay. We shall have not only one new party but two, only the unthinking will stay where they are caring for nothing but the name. They may as well be where they are as anywhere.

The Republican party is to be the exponent of that newer nationalism which regards the executive, in the selection of whom all participate, as the especial steward of the national welfare, rather than the judiciary, which can only interpret and decide, or the legislative, which is founded on state and district representation and is seldom broadly national. This new nationalism will demand that the nation do what only the nation can do, and that the states shall do only what concerns the states alone and not the union.

The Democratic party will stand, as of old, for, "the constitution as it is," and for government as it was. Already its leaders are being chosen with that purpose in mind. Chief among these is Judson Harmon of Ohio. Listen to him: "Uniformity of laws, when desirable, can be had by concerted state action. With the passing of Roosevelt the return to a normal proportion between state and federal government should begin." Could his trend of mind be made clearer?

Woodrow Wilson of New Jersey ranks next to Judson Harmon as leader of the safe and sane Democracy of our fathers. He is more progressive than Harmon, but stands stiff-legged with his toes on state lines refusing to budge over them.

Ranking third is Judge Gaynor of New York, a Democrat of the old school, but honest and capable, as are the other two, fine specimens of American manhood, all of them, but they will cling to the old nationalism, not the new.

The line-up is now plain. The contest in November, 1910, will be only a skirmish. It will decide nothing. The battle will be in November, 1912, but the mobilization now going on indicates where the lines will be drawn in 1912 and what the battle will be about. The prediction of The California Weekly will be fulfilled. Theodore Roosevelt returned from Africa to lend a hand to his friend and co-worker William Howard Taft, a good man and true, but a round peg in a square hole, a judge in an executive position, a bungling politician made the sport of pastmasters at the game. Theodore Roosevelt will lend a hand to pull him out of the hole into which his standpat associates have betrayed him. Henceforth his advisers will be of a different stripe.

This is 'no "quarrel," as the Chronicle calls it. It is a revolution. It is the profoundest movement among the American people since 1861. The call of the hour is for every man to cut loose from where he is, if he needs to, and go where he belongs unless he chances to be there already. Every voter with courage in his heart to face the future that we may move on to better things should vote the Republican ticket, here and everywhere. Every voter whose knees knock together whenever he thinks of the future, every voter who doubts the ability of the American people to govern themselves and who believes in his heart that we shall be better governed by the railroads and traction companies, the high financiers and the gas works, who believes that wisdom perished with Jefferson and Jackson and was buried with them in their graves—every such voter should ally himself with the reactionary element about to take full possession of the Democratic party of America. As for this paper, it elects to go forward.

Prof. Plehn's Articles

Next to the election of Hiram Johnson and a thoroughly good legislature to support his administration there is no issue before the voters of California so important as the right determination of Amendment No. 1. No part of our state government is more bunglingly administered than the department of taxation. It works more injustice than our judicial system with all its shortcomings and it does it automatically. The California Weekly is offering its readers and the press of the state the best analysis of this amendment to be had anywhere. In furnishing the series of short articles now running in these columns Professor Carl C. Plehn is performing, gratuitously, a most important public service. The articles are made short with especial reference to their adaptability to reproduction in the columns of other papers. We are sure that interior journals will confer a favor upon their readers by reproducing these articles. They are welcome to them. Their good influence should be widened as far as possible. The California Weekly has no ax to grind. It has merely a public service to perform. Hence this paragraph calling particular attention, of the interior press especially, to these articles. They have great value.

Oakland's Water Front Fight

The California Weekly confesses to a neglect of the issues growing out of the Oakland water front disposal and pleads in avoidance two things: That its editor despaired of being able, with other pressing cares, to get to the bottom of what has cost so many others so much time and effort to understand; that he has cherished great confidence in a group of Oakland men, known to be sincere champions of the city's rights, who have had the subject immediately in hand.

But of late, perhaps too late, the editor of this paper has become uneasy for the preservation of the rights of Oakland in the disposal of this water front. He is not so sure as he was that the rights of the city are being fully protected. For this reason Mr. Henry C. McPike was invited to present his views of the issue through the columns of this paper. He has done so. The reader will find his article of great interest. What he states he states clearly. Are his contentions sound? If they are then there is need for the Oakland city council going very slow lest great injury to the future development of Oakland result.

And, as a matter of sound principle, no city council should be empowered to alienate interests so important without a vote of all the people. The new charter, being now framed, provides for such a referendum. The council should not act upon the proposed franchise until such referendum can be had and, meantime, every phase of the issue can be threshed out in public and the public, when once informed, can be relied on to vote right. Delay cannot be half as dangerous as haste.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

The accouterment of an infantryman is just so much. He carries a change of clothing, so many rounds of ammunition, so many day's rations consisting of just such and such articles, no more no less. Long experience has demonstrated what the average man can carry for an average march, and they are the things that he must carry if he is to do the work assigned him. If he carry less he will not be efficient, if he carry more he will break down under the load.

Now individual soldiers can carry more, and individual soldiers find the prescribed accouterment too heavy, but man by man, in all weathers and on all roads, the weight a man can stand up under, and the things he will need, have been pretty thoroughly proven by experience. All the other thousand things that would be nice must be left behind.

So is it in going through life. Some can carry more, some not so much, but, man by man, woman by woman, up hill and down, there is an average load that we can carry and arrive. If we undertake to do more we shall fail of arriving. The number of those who do not quite arrive is legion. They have overloaded themselves. They have things in their knapsacks that have no business to be there, or else they have left out of them things indispensable in the moment of need. If the soldier is not efficient he is only food for worms. He does not justify his existence. It is the man behind the gun that tells, but it is the discipline, the drill, the equipment, the long marches that have tried him out, that make the man behind the gun the man he is.

So is it with all of us in civil life as well as in military, in domestic as well as in industrial. We are beset on every hand with things. The temptation to overload is besetting. In no other period of the world's history have there been so many activities, interests, distractions, calling us away from the straight line, inviting us to so overload ourselves as to make it impossible for us to make good when the crucial moment arrives.

Take the stuff that is writ and printed for us to read. "Reading makes a full man," but one cannot read all the time, and who that does not can keep up with current literature alone? When it was said that, "Of making many books there is no end," there was not one book made where now there are thousands. If we read the dailies we can hardly read the current magazines; if we read the current magazines (what splendid productions they are, too) we cannot read the new books that come out; if we read the new books we cannot read the old masterpieces; if we keep up with the development of the modern drama how shall we keep pace with the spirit of human progress moving the hearts of the multitude; if we keep in touch with this how shall we keep in touch with the growth of science, the unfolding of the religious life of the race? Verily, we need a thousand lives to be lived at once if we are to get all out of life that is laying at hand to be taken out.

We can't. We must not try. If we sow ourselves broadcast we shall come up mighty thin in a place to wither away and come to naught. We must drill ourselves in if we would yield any harvest, or, to get back to the simile with which we started, we must accouter ourselves according to our strength, the journey we are to take, the consummation that is expected of us.

The newspaper man must know a little about almost everything, but cannot know much about anything. The professor, the physician, the lawyer must know all of something but of many things nothing. We must each of us have our serious business in life and our fad, with some time and attention to devote to civil and social life. We must let the rest go. Absolutely we must. The penalty for not cutting out all else is failure to arrive. There are those who say that we shall be reincarnated again and again until we have, each of us, lived all of life. That is the only way it is to be done if all of life is to be lived.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

A Metal to Displace Steel

H. B. Weeks, head chemist for Vickers, Sons & Maxim, the well known British firm, has discovered an alloy, named by him duralumin, which, it is believed, will take the place of steel, brass, etc., in the manufactures to a considerable extent. The qualities which recommend the new metal favorably as a substitute for many of the metals now in common use are the following: It is very light, being but slightly heavier than aluminum, and yet it is as strong as steel; stronger than brass, it weighs but one-third as much. It also is less corrodible than steel, and this is a fact to be considered in the construction of machines that are to be much exposed to the air and weather. Its lightness would make it particularly useful in the building of airships of all kinds, and its use in the place of steel in the construction of a warship would decrease the vessel's displacement by several thousand tons. It is apparent that duralumin has come to be of service to the world of men, provided the claims made on its behalf are justifiable.

A Few Yards of Red Tape Unwound

It is probable that red tape pretty nearly attains its acme of red-tape perfection on this mundane sphere in Prussia. Witness a little incident which upset a Berliner's nerves not long ago: On his way to his business he saw a key lying on the sidewalk and, in an unguarded moment, picked it up. Having done so, he offered it to the policeman on the next corner, by whom he was politely informed that he (the finder) would have to take it to the main police station. Now it chanced that the station was five miles distant and the man was in a hurry; so, after due consideration, he took the key back where he found it, and laid it on the sidewalk. Well content, he was hastening away, when the Majesty of the Law, as represented by the policeman, sternly stopped him, and informed him that, having picked the article up, he must take it to the central station or be subject to fine and imprisonment. Is it necessary to say that the maddest man in Berlin then took that key to the station? To be sure, he was entitled to a reward amounting to one-tenth of the value of the article found, but as the article probably was not worth over five or ten cents, this fact did not seem to alleviate his ire very much. When it comes to unwinding red tape, let Prussia take the merited medal. To be sure, we have something of that sort on this side of the great waters, but the noble art here is still in its infancy, comparatively speaking.

The Pure Metal Radium at Last Obtained

Mme. Curie, who, with her husband, first discovered the element radium and announced its remarkable properties, recently reported to the French Academy of Sciences that she had at last succeeded in obtaining pure radium. Prior to that time radium had been developed only in the form of salts. Mme. Curie treated a decigram of bromide of radium by an electrolytic process, and obtained an amalgam from which pure radium was extracted by distillation. The metal is white, adheres strongly to iron, changes to black on exposure to air, burns paper with which it comes in contact, and oxidizes in water. This isolation of the wonderful metal from its compounds really is rather of scientific than of practical interest, as it adds nothing to its potency, but, at any rate, it goes a considerable distance toward removing the metal from the realm of mystery to that of accurate knowledge.

A Ring for Divorcees the Latest

Not all the latest fashions come out of Paris, although they are popularly supposed to do so. As an exception, rings for divorcees and for widows are of German invention. The widow's ring, which may be presumed naively to call attention to the fact that she possibly might be considered in the market, consists of a half-covered full moon—it has been fully covered by grief, but is gradually removing the pall and becoming lightsome again, you see. Isn't that a chastely neat idea? The divorcee's ring is, if possible, even more elegantly suggestive, or suggestively elegant. It consists of a plain gold band surrounded by a narrower band of silver or platinum, thus plaintively suggesting that the holy bond of matrimony has been cut in two—but, as everybody knows, either gold or platinum can be gold-plated, and then the yellow surface again would be complete. Isn't that a perfectly beautiful idea? These rings advertising widows and divorcees, and incidentally their Parkis-like willin'ness, ought to make a tremendous hit.

The Panama Canal Has a Rival

Perhaps the recently opened Tehuantepec railway should be considered an indication that the Panama canal is greatly needed, perhaps it should be regarded as a demonstration that the canal when completed is to have an aggressive and energetic rival, but the facts suggest that it is entitled to consideration of some sort. Already, although the railway has been in operation but a short time, its business has been so great that the Mexican government has contracted with Lord Cowdray, the main promoter of the enterprise, to double its tracks, and the second line of parallel rails soon will be laid. At the present time fifteen steamship companies are running vessels to both the eastern and western termini of the line, where they are afforded all modern facilities for handling cargoes. Two Japanese steamship companies also are negotiating for transportation facilities on the railroad, and a large amount of western Canadian wheat will be forwarded to Europe this year via this route. It appears to be possible that the great canal, when completed, may have a rival of noticeable size.

To Read, Sing and Dance Poetry

In London a society has been organized to popularize poetry, and, in order to do it with eclat and success, an organization known as The Poeticals is to visit various cities of the United Kingdom and demonstrate how beautiful poetry really is. In doing this one member of the organization will recite poetry, another will sing it, and yet another will dance it. Just how poetry should be danced might puzzle some of us, but, anyway, that is what is to be done, and it is presumed that at the end of the demonstration the departing audiences will be enthusiastic concerning the beauties of poetry. Which is all very well, but it appears to overlook the fact that one cannot inject the soul of poetry into the head of a cabbage. In these bubbling times of deification of Big Business the average man who listens to a "demonstration" will shake his head dubiously, say, "I can't see a dollar in it for me," and depart unsatisfied, while his lady, with equal dissatisfaction, will scathingly announce, "There wasn't a word said about the latest styles from Paris." And so will the effort, though most laudable in its intent, fall short of success. Cabbage heads are excellent in their place, but one cannot inoculate them with even germinal conception of the beauty that is in all poetry worthy of the name.

English Monarchs Buried in France

To one not deeply read in history it might seem strange that the bodies of several English monarchs and their consorts found their final rest, not in British soil, but in that of Sunny France. Nevertheless, such is the fact, and Lucien Magne, the French inspector general of historical monuments, recently discovered the tombs containing such skeletons in the abbey of Fontevault, near Saumur, France. There were found the remains of Henry II and his wife, the wife of King John, and the mouldering bones of Richard the Lion-Hearted, most romantic of all British kings. It appears that a former abess, Louise of Bourbon, in redecorating the cloisters, long ago closed the entrance to these tombs, and so they have been neither rifled nor in any way injured. It is believed that the remains of all four sovereigns will be reburied near the choir of the abbey, no demand for their return to England having been received thus far.

THE NEEDLE WORK GUILD

The Needle Work Guild was started in London about thirty years ago. Anybody who knows about the work of the guild knows what Lady Wolverton said when she set the ball in motion—she knew some noble ladies in England who had more than they needed and she knew some poor in London who had not enough—so she said, "I would like to build a bridge from the Island of Waste to the Island of Want—and I would like to build it of needle work."

So she set her friends to work—with their own hands, on plain useful garments—which were given out by the societies in London to the needy ones. Her Majesty took it up and it soon spread to the smaller towns where there was also need of such a "bridge."

Then it came to Canada. Mrs. John Wood Stewart—formerly Miss Safford of Santa Barbara—brought the idea to Edgewood, New Jersey, just twenty-five years ago. Now it is firmly established in the United States with three hundred branches. The national secretary—Miss Bender—is the same individual who started as secretary in the little circle which Mrs. Stewart organized in New Jersey so many years ago.

Mrs. E. G. Denniston is president of the San Francisco branch, and is also on the national board of directors. The gift of two garments constitutes membership. A director collects from ten members. A section president receives the reports from directors. Ten section presidents constitute what is known as a "city branch." Any city falling below that record is listed as a "village."

It is easy to see, with such an organization all over the country, what invaluable aid the guild is able to render in case of sudden calamity. The annual reports show what has been done in the cases of Galveston, Baltimore, and our own San Francisco.

For many years San Francisco led in her needle work guild reports of garments next to the home city—Philadelphia.

So when her need came, it was met with energy and zeal by the cities of the United States.

A SAN FRANCISCAN'S CRUISE

A letter from Chester A. Davis, Vice-United States Consul at Colombo, Ceylon, says: "An interesting arrival in the harbor this morning (August 17) was the two masted American yacht Seafarer. This little vessel, which has a gross tonnage of 42, is on a trip around the world and is skippered by her owner, L. A. Norris of San Francisco, who has on board with him his little daughter and a companion, Miss Helen Wyld of Seattle, and a crew of nine. Port Said was the last port touched at, and prior to that visits were paid to Malta, Naples, Marseilles, Gibraltar and the Azores.

"The Seafarer left Boston on April 12, Port Said was left on July 27, and therefore as the engine is an auxiliary 35 horsepower motor, which takes the boat along at a speed of six knots an hour only, it will be seen that the winds were favorable and that the sailing, so to speak, did most of the work. It was all plain sailing, and though the seas were rough off the island of Socotra the weather was never sufficiently bad to cause anxiety.

"Mr. Norris will stay here only one or two days, as he is anxious to get through to Yokohama in the southwest monsoon after touching at Singapore. He is trying to make a quick passage, as in the northeast monsoon it is impossible to get up the China Sea and across the Pacific. He expects to reach San Francisco in a couple of months or ten weeks and plans to cross the Pacific without calling anywhere, taking four or five weeks to do so. He has stores and provisions sufficient to last for one year."

THE SALMON FLEET IS HOME

ONE OF CALIFORNIA'S LARGEST INDUSTRIES IS IN ALASKA

Money is easy on East street. The salmon fleet is home. The crop movements may make money tight in the interior, and even Admission Day festival may not have made the visiting populace loosen up enough elsewhere in San Francisco, but on East street it flows. Flows is the right word in the right place, for East street is the waterfront of San Francisco, and three doors out of five on East street open into saloons, and the money flows as the liquid refreshments do.

Go along East street any day in midsummer and you will see only straggling groups of sailors waiting to "sign and sail again," or sailors on shore leave, or sailors who don't want work. Walk along East street tomorrow and you will have to pick your way through a dense throng of humanity; you will see every saloon door swinging; you will hear the vernacular of sailors; you will see the bronzed faces and brooding eyes of the sea. The salmon fleet is home.

They shipped last March, eight or nine thousand strong, shipload after shipload of men, bound for the North Pacific. One fleet alone contains thirty ships, three of them steamers, some of them shipping as many as two hundred men. In thirty days, forty days, sixty days, they will be anchored on the Alaskan coast, in Bristol Bay or Shelikof Strait or Cook's Inlet. A few days more and they will have discharged their cargo of sheet tin, the forty or fifty canneries will be opened after the winter's silence, bunk houses will be opened, thousands of men will be at work in the canneries manufacturing tin cans by the million to hold the season's catch, and other thousands of men will be overhauling the seines and gill-nets and traps, preparing for the day when the hordes of salmon shall begin to "run."

The salmon has habits that lead him surely to destruction. He is a salt water fish that is born only in fresh water. Scientists differ as to details of his career, but roughly these seem to be the essential facts in it. For four years from birth he sports and feeds in the salt water of the Pacific Ocean, probably never straying far from shore, but showing no inclination to return to his river or lake birthplace. But in the spring and summer of the fourth year the schools are ready to spawn, and at once, by an irresistible impulse the whole number of four-year-olds make for fresh water with a determination that only death can quell. Tradition says that each fish seeks the very stream of his birth, but science scoffs at this. But it is certain that one species will enter only those streams whose sources are in lakes, because their eggs hatch only in shallow, quiet water, while other species care not at all what sort of stream they enter only that they must find its source. Many salmon yearly reach the trickling rivulets at the headwaters of the Columbia river and of the Sacramento river, others go nearly 2,000 miles up the Yukon before they stop to spawn. And having spawned, they die, leaving their generation to be remembered only by the schools of young salmon that go down the streams the following spring, equally guided by instinct toward the sea, and equally determined to get there over shallows and past waterfalls.

It is the progress toward fresh water that is called the "run"; that means death to millions of salmon every year; that makes work for thousands of sailors and laborers and mechanics; and that annually adds from 200 to 250 million pounds of fish to the world's food supply.

When the run comes there is little rest or sleep or time to eat until it ends, for the heavy run usually lasts only two or three weeks, and the catch of those few days must earn the interest upon millions of dollars of invested capital besides paying the season's wages of the eager thousands who sail with the salmon fleet. Here the "spiller" of a trap is hoisted, and forty thousand fish that a moment ago were on their way to distant inland streams are floundering on the deck of a scow, a few hours later to be neatly sliced and canned and cooked and ready to receive a label that will attract your eye across the grocery counter. Yonder a seine is being dragged to shore by means of a winch, and other wriggling thousands are heaped upon the beach to go the same way. And at the mouth of a neighboring stream the gill-net that formed a barrier from shore to shore is being hauled to a landing, where its struggling myriads are disentangled from the linen meshes of the net.

While the big run lasts, everybody—fishermen, packers and all—works day and night. The canneries are distributed along the coast so as to be as near as possible to the places where the fish are caught. Most of the catch is captured within a radius of fifty miles of the packing houses, but in some districts a sail of 150 miles is not considered too great for the precious spoil to be carried.

It may be worth while here to describe the species of salmon and the territorial limits of their production in more detail. On the Atlantic coast of America there is only one species of salmon. But on the Pacific coast of America there are five distinct species. These are as follows, naming them in the order of their merit as foods:

1. King Salmon, which is the largest of all the species, averaging thirty pounds in weight and often running higher. Its flesh, when caught at the proper season, is red and juicy and the flavor is the most delicate of all salmon. Though the best grade of salmon, it constitutes not more than ten per cent of the yearly pack, principally because of its relative scarcity. More than half the pack of this species comes from the Columbia river. Like all salmon, it is known by different names in different fishing districts, and is sold by the trade under these names. King salmon and the place of its origin can be identified under the following names: "King salmon," from Alaska; "Spring salmon," from British Columbia; "Tyee," from Puget Sound; "Chinook," from the Columbia river; "Quinnat" or "Chinook" from the outside rivers.

2. Red Salmon is by far the most extensively canned of all the species. It is a small fish, ranging in weight from five to eleven pounds. The flesh is firm and a very intense red in color. It ranks below the king salmon only in being a very little less delicate in flavor and in the fact that the meat is somewhat dryer than that of the king. As it constitutes more than half of all the salmon sold in cans it is practically the most popular and most useful of the various species. It is the staple brand of first class salmon. This species, when packed under the name "Red salmon," comes from Alaska; when under the name "Sockeye," from British Columbia or Puget Sound; when under the name "Blueback," from the Columbia river. There is no other source of supply. Seventy per cent of the salmon pack in Alaska is of this species.

3. Cohoe Salmon is slightly smaller than the red salmon, but the flesh is paler and the flavor less delicate. The name Cohoe or Medium Red identifies it as Alaskan; simply Cohoe either from Alaska, British Columbia or Puget Sound; and Silversides as from the Columbia river or other rivers.

4. Pink Salmon is the smallest species, and is so named only in Alaska. In British Columbia and Puget Sound it goes by the name of Humpback. It is not caught elsewhere. The flesh is too soft to be very palatable.

5. Dog or Chum Salmon is known by the same name wherever caught. It is dirty white in color and has a rank flavor.

The principal markets for canned salmon are the United States and Great Britain, but large quantities of the cheaper grades are sold in the Orient, and some part of the better grades in Canada and Australia.

After the runs are over and the goods are all packed and stowed on the vessels, the sail homeward is begun. The "season" of four to six months is mostly consumed in going to the fishing grounds, in preparation for the runs, in cleaning up after the runs and sailing home. The actual period of fishing and canning extends only over a few weeks. The vessels that went up with can metal and supplies come back laden with the canned and cased goods, ready for shipment to dealers immediately after the boats dock in San Francisco.

Californian interest in the salmon trade is especially aroused because of the fact that, after the lumber and oil shipping, the salmon fleet is the largest sea industry of California. Of the eight or nine thousand men who ship with the fleet from San Francisco every spring, probably three thousand are sailors.

California is pre-eminent in this industry. At a glance this seems strange, because the fishing is practically all done in northern waters. But there are several reasons for San Francisco's lead. In the first place, the industry was founded in California. The first salmon cannery on this coast was established on the Sacramento river, opposite the city of Sacramento, by William Hume, G. W. Hume and Andrew S. Hapgood, in 1864. The first considerable canning was undertaken by San Francisco capitalists. The industry first grew to large proportions in San Francisco, which has consequently remained to this day the best market for the necessary labor.

Another reason is this: the bulk of the best salmon are caught and packed off the coast of central Alaska, in the neighborhood of the Alaska Peninsula. A glance at the map will show that the Alaska Peninsula extends so far west from the longitude of San Francisco and Seattle that the sail from San Francisco is not very much longer than the sail from Seattle. And as San Francisco companies first developed the Alaskan fisheries, they have always had an advantage that the small difference in distance in favor of Seattle has not been enough to dislodge them.

The dimensions of the industry may be gathered by the fact that one San Francisco company alone, the Alaska Packers' Association, sends thirty large vessels yearly to Alaska, and thousands of men. Their pack this year exceeded 2,000,000 cases, a case containing 48 one-pound cans. The wholesale price of red salmon is something over $4 a case. So this one company does a gross annual business of $8,000,000 or $9,000,000. It maintains a fleet of 900 small boats at one of its sixteen canneries, and of several hundred each at some of its other canneries. It maintains over 500 miles of telephone lines, and has installed several wireless telegraph stations on the coast for use in its business. And the Alaska Packers, though the largest concern in the salmon industry, and by far the largest outfitting at San Francisco, is not the only Californian company. So it is easy to see that salmon fishing, though practiced very little in California itself, ranks as one of the chief industries of the state.

The salmon fleet is home. The goods have been unloaded and stored in the warehouses. The ships will soon be laid up for the winter in Oakland creek, where their masts will point upward at high tide, and where, at ebb tide, their sides will rest unwieldy on the mud, like elephants at rest. The sailors have left the vessels and are looking about now, some to sign for coastwise cruises, some to work as fishermen on the bay or in the Sacramento river, some to work as longshoremen on the city's docks. They have just received their wages for the whole season's work, $300, $400, some $600. More than a million dollars has been turned loose to them in the last few weeks. That is why the waterfront is crowded. That is why money is easy on East street. Next spring you will see them again, outward bound.

Miss Mabel Boardman of Washington city was the only woman speaker on the regular program at the national conservation congress. Miss Boardman's subject was "Conservation, the Principle of the Red Cross." Women's clubs from almost every state in the union sent representatives. The General Federation of Women's Clubs was represented.

WALTER MACARTHUR

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

Go down to East street on the waterfront of San Francisco, turn south from Market street and thread your way through the throng of sailors who crowd the sidewalk—sailors from all the seven seas and from more than the five nations—until you come to a dingy, two-storied building, No. 46 East street. Mount the stairs and turn to the left to a door marked, "Coast Seamen's Journal." Inside that door, at a small, old desk, and looking out the window at his left over the wharves upon the shipping of the harbor, sits a thick-set, powerfully built man, with an aquiline nose, a broad and high forehead, closely cropped, curly hair, and gray, thoughtful eyes. He has sat at that desk for twenty years. It has seen him rise from sailor before the mast to one of the most honored, most widely respected and most influential men in San Francisco. But it has seen no change in his sturdy character nor any added frills because of growth in public respect.

That man is Walter MacArthur.

He is all man. When he rises, you see strength, quiet but tremendous, in every line of his figure. And as you talk with him you see another kind of strength, strength of character, as quiet and as tremendous, in every line of his face and in every word he speaks. Here is one of the most remarkable men in the public life of San Francisco, a man who has fought for the cause of union labor and the betterment of the condition of sailors, sometimes having to fight the unions for their own good, sometimes fighting the employers, but recognized by friend and opponent alike as doing always what he believed to be wise, just and for the greatest good.

Walter MacArthur was born in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1862, and went to sea as a common sailor in his boyhood. For fifteen years he served as a sailor before the mast in the ships of various nations. He landed on the Pacific Coast more than twenty years ago, and soon attracted the attention of his fellow members of the Sailors' Union of the Pacific by his wise and shrewd articles contributed to the Coast Seamen's Journal. He was soon elected manager of the paper, and later its editor, an office he has occupied ever since.

MacArthur rapidly rose in the esteem of the public of San Francisco, his influence extending far beyond the limited field of his regular duties in the cause of the sailors' union. He was frequently called upon to address public meetings when questions affecting the general welfare were discussed, and he unfailingly espoused the cause of justice in such debates, regardless of its popularity or unpopularity with his own friends or the public at the time. His name came to be synonymous with sound and sober thought and high moral courage. In the twenty years of his residence in San Francisco he has been sought out for advice not merely by laboring men but by all classes of citizens and especially by those men in public life who were working for better conditions in politics and government. This is not merely a thoughtless generalization: the list of his public services in this respect would by itself fill the space allotted for this article.

MacArthur also achieved a reputation as a writer on economic subjects. Articles from his pen have been printed by such magazines as Scribner's, the Forum and the Arena. On labor subjects particularly his writings have been widely circulated. Some years ago he wrote an essay on Union Labor that received the first prize in a national competition held under the auspices of the American Federation of Labor. This work, in pamphlet form, has been broadly distributed by the federation. Another pamphlet, "Trade Union Epigrams," has been distributed by the federation.

His life work, of course, has been to improve the condition of life of American seamen. In this cause his achievements rank with the foremost in the world. In 1892, the Sailors' Union of the Pacific, after seven years of unavailing effort to accomplish what seamen the world over had been trying in vain to accomplish for centuries, appointed a committee to prepare such amendments to the existing maritime law as would enable them to better their conditions of service in several vital respects. Walter MacArthur was secretary of that committee and did all of the clerical and much of the advisory work in the preparation of those amendments.

Two of the most glaring evils of the then existing maritime law were those that permitted the imprisonment of deserters from vessels and the signing away of wages in advance of their earning. The first of these evils led directly to the unbelievable brutalities that were formerly commonly practiced on sailors by masters of vessels, and the latter was the stronghold of the "crimping" system.

To consider these in order: Under the law as it existed prior to 1895, a sailor was required to sign "articles," otherwise a contract, when he shipped on a vessel. These articles bound him to serve on the vessel during the life of the contract, regardless of any conditions he might find himself facing after he boarded the vessel. The ship might prove to be a death trap, the owner might supply food that was starvation diet, the master might practice any brutality he pleased; the sailor was bound to stay by the boat. The penalty for desertion was three months' imprisonment. The "Maguire Act," which was the bill framed on the basis of the union committee's report, abolished the penalty of imprisonment and provided, instead, that the deserter should only lose whatever pay was due him at the time of desertion. This act practically gave the sailor the same freedom of his body that the law guarantees to other servants. It was bitterly fought by the shipowners, who declared that it put a premium upon desertion and would endanger the lives of passengers. In operation, on the contrary, it has resulted in a steady decrease of desertions. And under the law and in practice the desertions never occur except when the ships are safely docked or are moored in a safe harbor.

The matter of the "advance," as it was called, had equally bad effects before the law was altered. In those days the law permitted a sailor to sign a note for half of his unearned wages when he shipped to sea. In practice, masters of sailors' boarding houses managed to keep the sailors constantly in debt, so that they could ship them at a disadvantage to the sailors and to the advantage of shipowners. This practice, called "crimping," kept a large percentage of the sailors in what amounted to involuntary servitude to pay out of debt. The Maguire Act prohibited the advance and at a sweep closed out the crimping business and made the sailor a free agent.

In the preparation of these amendments, which shipowners now concede were salutary for them as well as the seamen, Walter MacArthur had a leading part.

But the work was not finished by the Maguire Act. In the famous "Arago case," known in law books as the case of Robert Robertson vs. Barry Baldwin, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the Maguire Act applied only to vessels engaged in coastwise voyages and did not extend its protection to American seamen who shipped for foreign countries, even though the desertion might take place in an American port. The work that had been brought to a successful issue in the passage of the Maguire Act in 1895 had now to be done all over, and MacArthur again took a leading part in the work, resulting in the passage of the "White Act," which extended some of the benefits to all American seamen.

Mention was made above of the brutalities practiced on American seamen. These were made possible by the binding and unqualified nature of the articles signed by the sailors, and by the further fact that, upon trial for brutal treatment, a ship's master did not have to prove that his treatment of a sailor was justified but only had to prove that he deemed it justified at the time by the necessities of discipline. Under this law masters were repeatedly freed after a trial showing that they had broken sailors' heads or arms with belaying pins, shot sailors off masts, and starved and otherwise maltreated them. American vessels were known on the seas of the whole world as "hell ships."

About twelve years ago this matter was up before congress for consideration, and to help bring the evil to their attention, MacArthur compiled a book, which he entitled "The Red Record," containing the record of a large number of such cases of brutality, authenticated by court records. This book was distributed to the press of America and to the members of congress, and produced a profound impression. It undoubtedly gave essential aid to the movement that resulted in the passage of legislation by congress correcting the evil.

The immediate benefits of these achievements of MacArthur's of course accrued directly to the sailors, but they entitle him to a high place in the regard of the general public as well. A man whose courage and humanitarian instincts lead him to make a brave and victorious fight for the oppressed in any class is a benefactor of the whole people. It is not merely that he was fighting to improve his own condition, for his abilities were such that he could at any time desert the cause of seamen and earn far more with less labor in another calling. It was unselfish and patriotic devotion of the highest type.

Walter MacArthur's record as an arbiter of labor troubles is patent to all citizens of San Francisco. He has been a consistent advocate of conciliation and mediation in labor disputes, and he has repeatedly averted costly labor wars by prudent counsel. At the same time, he has not been afraid to fight where peace meant loss of manhood. When he has fought, he has fought hard, but he has always played fair.

His ideal of citizenship is high. A naturalized citizen of America, he appreciates the value of citizenship more than many who were born to its privileges, because he knows from experience the contrast of rights enjoyed by citizens of other lands. He has always felt, and still feels, that the highest honor to which a man can achieve is to earn the recognition of having done the full measure of his duty as an American citizen. He believes that the exercise of the duties of citizenship calls for all of a man's capacity for service and honesty and courage and conscience. He has felt that the seeking for office put an American citizen in the position of a servant in the house rather than the higher position of sovereign. He has never held office and he has repeatedly refused

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

The Supreme Lightning Change Artist

You may talk about the chrysalis that makes the butterfly,
And argue that in nature's realm no change with this can vie;
You may mention, too, the polliwog that shifts into a frog,
And claim that it the limit plays in traveling incog;
That these are changes picturesque I here and now confess,
And yet I think I'll mention one that beats them more or less:
The little, gaunt, ungainly girl, nor infant nor a Miss,
Who makes the queenly lass we love—she beats the chrysalis.

You saw her yesterday—God wot she was a sight to see,
With hair that hung in stringy braids, with skirts unto her knee;
With freckles on her turned-up nose and eke upon her face,
And not a promise anywhere of anything of grace.
You saw her once again today—a miracle, no doubt,
The straggling, awkward, shapeless form was curved and rounded out,
The freckles gone, the lass a maid to lure you with her eye,
And here I vow the chrysalis was more than butterfly.

Oh, little awkward girls galore, a prophet's eye might see How in your guise is set the germ of perfectness to be,
But we, who are not seers at all, do idly pass each girl,
Until one day she blossoms forth and sets our hearts awhirl,
The being of a sovereign grace whom we name Lady Fair,
And fain would win for her the race and hold her in our care.
The credit due to chrysalis and polliwog is small;
As artists of the lightning change the lasses beat them all.

The Soft Soap Gang

Now that the battle is one-half fought; now that the earliest skirmish is won; now that the throat of the S. P.'s caught, and we're likely to throttle the son of a gun; now that for right we have taken our stand, and Greed, the debaucher, is seeking his lair, while a justice bearing no S. P. brand is the very least that the "traffic will bear;" now that these blessings have come to pass, for the people's voice like a trumpet rang, list to the words of the Whispering Class, the warnings you'll hear from the Soft Soap Gang.

"Amity, amity, soap and dope! Let the Right admit Iniquity's claim. Cover your wounds with our own soft soap, for this is the way you must win the game."

Now Johnson fought like the bravest brave—"amity, amity, soap and dope!"—and he wouldn't fall down, and he would not cave, though the Whisperers urged him to try soft soap. And the trumpet today doth no less call for the brave to stand, though the cowards slink, than it did when the S. P. owned us all and we only drank when it offered drink. A battle half fought is a battle unwon, so muskets to shoulders—the bugle rang!—and heed ye no whit how the whispers run, nor list to the words of the Soft Soap Gang:

"Amity, amity, soap and dope! Let the Right admit Iniquity's claim."—Nay, but the Manhood is e'er our hope that truckles to none lest it lose the game.

Seems to me sometimes that the mistake some reel well-meanin' folks make is in tryin' to measure the size of God's power an' love with the five-foot tapelines they carry in their pockets.

The Opinions of Rufus

Poor an' humble es I am I can't help feelin' grateful to think that I've contributed my mite to the upbuildin' of Chicago university. Me an' Rockefeller an' the rest that use oil did it.

The main difference 'tween a has-been an' a good many of the rest of us consists in the fact that we never were.

The difficulty with which a feller gits hold of popularity is only equalled by the ease with which he lets go of it.

Josh Bings says he s'poses even an automobilist can be a Christian, but he never heered of one offerin' a weary foot-traveler a ride.

Some folks treat their religion 'bout es they would egg-shell china—es if it was too valuable to be used 'cept when there's company.

Most of us treat fame with a kind o' distant respect. Fer instance, we all of us fairly dote on Shakespeare—but I'll bet your volume of his works hasn't been opened fer six months.

Es I understand it, a Browning society is one that is organized for the sake of makin' Robert's ghost ashamed that it's suspected of his havin' thought such things when he was writin'.

When I read in a newspaper three columns devoted to tellin' 'bout a thrillin' an' exemplary murder, while a half inch tells 'bout a national session of a Christian Endeavor society, I can't help wonderin' if the world is improvin' es fast es the Apostle Paul anticipated.

Notwithstandin' the fact that a rose by any other name would smell es sweet, I can't help feelin' grateful that no modern scientist got a chance to name it. Prob'ly life would have been too short to pronounce it.

Like es not the honesty that has to consult a civil or criminal code to decide how much stretchin' it 'll stand don't git much credit on the big ledger that's kept Up-Stairs.

Here's to the Easy Mark

Here's to the Easy Mark! If you repeat the words after me the chances are fair that you will do so with a half humorous, half contemptuous, wholly kindly feeling for the individual whom you pledge, for the world generally likes its Easy Marks, but it does not in-dorse their conduct very much. You see, an Easy Mark is a man who is born into this world with a great, loving heart, and anybody must see that he is a palpable misfit on a planet where grab is the lauded game.

In my time I have known a considerable number of Easy Marks, and, watching their gyrations from a disinterested standpoint, it has occurred to me sometimes that perhaps, when it comes to the final shuffle, they may occupy pews several rows in advance of those of us who are not so Easy as Marks. A Down and Out approaches an Easy Mark. Sometimes he painfully tries to maintain semblance of respectability, frequently he does not, but, in any event, the Easy Mark listens to his tale of woe and says to himself: "Poor devil! Probably he is lying, but, anyway, it is evident that life's gales beat hard upon him, and if I can give him one ray of sunshine, why shouldn't I do it?" Then he goes down in his jeans.

Foolish? Of course. The men who get rich do not do it by responding to misery's plea, and, as the most of us admit by word or action, the main object in this life is to accumulate dollars. Oh, yes, tremendously foolish, and yet do you know that I cannot get over the impression that some of us are going to see some notorious Easy Marks sitting a long way ahead of us on the marble pews Up-stairs. Probably I am mistaken, but wouldn't you understand, in reading the Good Book, that more approval was given to the Samaritan Easy Mark than to the wise and sagacious Leading Citizens who passed by on the other side? So it seems to me, and so again, in conclusion, I say:

Here's to the Easy Mark!

Murder! Now to It!

A murder, with more than the ordinary amount of ghastly and shameful details, has been revealed. Now let not your massive brains overlook anything, ye managing editors. Get busy, and supremely busy, ye city editors. On the trail, ye reporters, no matter into what blood-sodden mazes it may lead you. Murder has been committed, a tortured and life-deserted body rots into nothingness, and the public fain would sit at its carrion feast. Get busy; columns and pages must reek of slaughter and go blood-red to your readers, for this it is that the dear, great public demands.

But does the public demand it? Does it indeed insist that the smell of gore shall be mixed with the fragrance of its morning coffee or evening tea? Or is it just possible—barely possible, you understand—that the great editors are mistaken, that the people are not so incarnadined in their literary appetite as is presumed in the holy of holies of newspaper offices?

These are important questions, for if the great editors are mistaken they are tremendously blameable for feeding the public on the horrible food of such crime as must have been born of hell's suggestion. If, on the other hand, the people demand such gory meat, the blame may, at any rate, be impartially distributed.

Do the people demand such food? Well, do you, who are one of the people? Do you turn to the blood-soaked columns first of all and dwell on them most lingeringly? If you absolve yourself of guilt in this connection, how about your neighbor who sits next you on the car or boat? Is he poring over the red-dripping columns, or is he not? Who is responsible for this very revel in the details of awful crime which the great editors deem that the public demands?

In some degree the answer seems to be up to you and me. We cannot sway the public, but we can, at any rate, make known our individual distaste for that sort of food. And here is one who in this manner is endeavoring to do so.

A Song for Baby Pattikin

A song for Baby Pattikin,
Who doesn't know what world he's in,
Except, as sagely I surmise,
He reads its lore in mama's eyes;
For mama's eyes are very kind,

As mama's eyes are unco' blue,
And so none knows what he may find Within their deeps to whisper to
My little Baby Pattikin,
My pretty one, my Pattikin.

A song for Baby Pattikin,
Ofttimes he makes a shocking din,
With battling arms and waving feet,
And fain am I to beat retreat,
Till mama sings a lullaby

Of neither lore nor wisdom deep,
Yet, with a peaceful, tranquil sigh,
Down-sinketh to the realm of sleep
My little Baby Pattikin,
My pretty one, my Pattikin.

A song for Baby Pattikin,
Whose smile's a lure the world to win,
So sweet that I, though sagely wise,
Forget his yester-even cries,
The while his mother to her breast
Doth hold him when the day is done
And whispers words I half have guessed:
"My little one, my little one!
My little Baby Pattikin,
My pretty one, my Pattikin!"

Ordinary Test of the Profound

"What did you think of the lecture?"

"I considered it very learned and profound."

"Indeed! What gave you that impression?"

"Why, I noticed that there was at least a third of the words he used that I never had heard before."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

The Triumph Of Roosevelt

The great news of the week was the victory of Theodore Roosevelt in the Republican state convention at Saratoga, New York. In the "Old Guard" The Interests were entrenched. Their overthrow was not less complete in New York than in California. The leadership of Theodore Roosevelt achieved there what the leadership of Hiram Johnson achieved here, a signal and decisive victory. The "Old Guard" do not believe in the ability of the American people to govern themselves. They believe that government by The Interests, through the instrumentality of hired bosses, is the best government. Under that form of government those who are made of the right stuff will be able to get on, those who are not—well, a shrug of the shoulders for them. The enormously rich will not be lacking in charity. Roosevelt and his following believe that the cure for the evils of democracy is more democracy. They have seen government by the bosses have for its deliberate purpose the misrepresentation of the popular will and they have declared that government shall be representative of the popular will, that if it cannot be so through representative forms it shall be so through direct forms. In the language of the Lion Hunter, "Bossism is the negation of democracy," and, since heaven knows when, neither political party in New York has been free. As for the Republican party in the empire state its shackles were struck from it on Tuesday, September the twenty-seventh, one thousand and nine hundred ten, an epoch-marking day and date. Whether it shall maintain its liberty or sink into peonage remains to be seen. It is for the manhood of York state to say.

The Spirit Of The Revolution

What the "quarrel" is all about is clearly stated, first, in the address of Theodore Roosevelt in taking the chair as temporary chairman and, second, in the remarks of Elihu Root, the next day, in taking the chair as permanent chairman. Mr. Roosevelt, in part, said this: "We are against corruption in politics; we are against corruption in business, and above all and with all our strength we are against the degrading alliance of crooked business with crooked politics, the alliance that adds strength to the already powerful corrupt boss and to the already powerful head of Big Business, and which makes them in their dual capacity enemies against whom every patriotic man should stand with unwavering firmness. Let no man say that this is an assault upon the honest business man."

This is the way Senator Root stated the case: "Initiative, referendum and recall, direct election of United States senators, direct nominations of candidates, all these are evidences that the people of our country feel that our forms of political organization do not adequately furnish the voters of our political parties means to give effect to their political will."

Because the statements of Roosevelt are true the statements of Root have become true. It is a wrong to the people to force direct legislation upon them. Government should be representative, but if it is not, and Big Business and Bossism will not let it be representative, what else can the people do but submit to their fate or fight to a finish? Thank God we are in for a finish fight.

Ticket and Platform

The ticket made by the Republican convention in New York is probably as good as could be made. Henry L. Stimson, the nominee for governor, is representative of the best Republicanism of our time and, as prosecutor of the sugar frauds, he accomplished good results, as good as he could. The humiliation of it is that the real beneficiaries of the crimes committed, the big stockholders, could not be reached and that a sympathetic judge was extremely tender of the scoundrels who were convicted. Stimson was not to blame for that.

The platform, judging from the meagre excerpts which have reached us, is disappointing. What it says is true enough, but what it leaves unsaid is more so. Probably Theodore had to make concessions in order to hold the administration influence with him for what he regards as the main fight—the direct primary. If that fight can be won a new state of things will develop in New York and in the nation. It is probably true that the Payne-Aldrich law is a better tariff law than the Dingley law was, but that it was either a fulfillment of the pledges of the Republican party or the expectations of the American people neither Roosevelt nor Taft will ever convince the public mind, and for the simple reason that it is not so.

There are those who will look upon any concession as treachery. The Watchman is willing to accept the result in New York as the best that could be obtained in the circumstances there existing and make the best of it, trusting the men on the ground. Roosevelt has a great fight ahead of him as it is. The Watchman trusts his judgment in preference to his own but would have liked to see a little more Wisconsin leaven in the New York platform.

Democrats Of New York

It is regrettable that this paper must go to press before the results of the Democratic state convention, being held at Rochester, New York, are known, but there are indications that are fairly safe to rely on. Nothing of the newer nationalism for them! Alton B. Parker is to be the temporary chairman of the convention. He is the antithesis of Roosevelt and Rooseveltism. As Roosevelt, as temporary chairman, gave the keynote to the Republican convention, so Judge Parker, as temporary chairman of the Democratic state convention, will "keynote" the Democracy for 1912. It is likely that the Democratic convention will endorse the direct primary idea. It will not dare do anything else, but, for the rest, the makers of the platform will probably content themselves with saying "taint so" to what Republicans have said. Tammany is the center of power in the convention. It will determine its action. Edward M. Shepard seems to have the inside chance for the nomination. The fitness of things is on his side. He is a big, prudent, safe and sane corporation attorney.

Wisconsin's Platform Has the Right Ring

The Wisconsin platform of the Republican party is a pronouncement of the unafraid. It is the voice of the advance guard, that of New York is the voice of the main army. Robert La Follette is and ever has been out on the firing line, doing line work, but advancing more rapidly than the main body of Republicans possibly can. For this reason he has never had the cordial support or commendation of either Roosevelt or Taft. He is a bit too wild-eyed and long-haired for them, but not for Wisconsin. Wisconsin believes in him and stands by him and is ready to follow where he leads. Its platform demands physical valuation of railroads; federal ownership of Alaskan railroads; initiative, referendum and recall; a graduated income tax; local option in the liquor traffic; national control of natural resources; regulation of working hours of women and children. These things are, or ought to be, all coming. Had the convention in New York stood for them the Republican party would have foredoomed itself to defeat. As it is Theodore Roosevelt will have to throw himself into the New York fight like hunting lions in order to win and, even in Wisconsin, it will be no walk-over for La Follette. He will have to contest every inch of ground. If his health does not break down he'll do it. He is as doughty a David as ever went up against any Goliath and, in going up against the brewing and lumbering interests of his state, he is tackling a much bigger Philistine than did David of old.

Theodore Bell Is Needlessly Nettled

At Los Angeles Gifford Pinchot expressed the opinion that the defeat of Hiram Johnson would be a national calamity, whereat Theodore Bell flies off the handle and demands to know what business the contest in California is to the nation anyway and why Mr. Pinchot should arrogate to himself and his associates all the honesty of purpose and all the patriotism in the country. Mr. Bell allowed himself to be needlessly nettled. Gifford Pinchot did not disparage Mr. Bell or question his integrity or sincerity. He merely stated the fact that the defeat of Hiram Johnson in California, like the defeat of La Follette in Wisconsin or the defeat of the Roosevelt movement in New York, or the defeat of the progressive element in the Republican party wherever it has gained the upper hand, would be a national calamity. So it would. On the contrary the defeat of the Canonized Republicanism in Maine and its humiliation in Vermont—these were national benefactions. They demonstrate that the old form of Republicanism no longer suits Republicans. Mr. Bell had his chance to lead such a revolt four years ago. He was just a little, but only a little, ahead of his time. His victory then would have made the redemption of the Republican party from corporation domination vastly easier than it has been. His victory now would make it vastly more difficult. Of course he is not concerned for the redemption of the Republican party, but the state is, and so is the nation, because it is and is likely to continue to be the dominant party in state and nation. The stars in their courses fight not for Theodore Bell. That's the trouble. It is his misfortune, not his fault.

A Questionable Factor Is Being Introduced

If reports that come to our ears are to be relied on the issues in the election of state senators and assemblymen are being needlessly confused by over-zealous promoters of the Panama-Pacific exposition. The constitutional amendment authorizing state aid to the exposition very properly empowers the legislature to say upon what conditions the money shall be expended. If the safeguarding of the state's funds be the purpose in view that issue can be left to any legislature likely to be selected. There is no need that candidates be sounded in advance, and influence be brought to bear for or against, unless there is some object in view other than that of properly protecting the interests of the state. A very grave danger in this whole affair is that some private or corporate, rather than public, interest be subserved in expending that money, such, for instance, as locating the exposition on Spring Valley or other private grounds rather than upon the now undeveloped portions of Golden Gate park that might be beneficially improved if selected as the exposition site. There was seemingly no desire to require, but only to permit, the use of the park for this purpose. The legislature should see to it that no dollar of state money goes primarily to the benefit of private property, and San Francisco should see to it that she gets a permanent benefit from what must otherwise be of very impermanent value to the city.

Extra-Session Somersault

Those who know Governor Gillett best are never surprised when he changes his mind. If he were not to do so they would be astounded. It is said that he said flatfootedly that he would not call an extra session to correct the error in amendment number one. He called it. He declared, it will be remembered, that he would not interfere with the grizzly-gorilla combat in San Francisco. He did interfere with it in a way the fight promoters despised. Would that his change of mind anent the amendment could be as well justified as in relation to the prize fight. The Watchman believes that, on the whole, it will be wise for the state to adopt that amendment.

but this does not blind him to the truth that The Interests, all of them back of Gillett, are very anxious that the amendment be adopted, and if this be not the reason for the change of mind in regard to the extra session where shall we look for it? Are the Governor's oft repeated reversals of himself to be accounted for on the ground that his first determinations are those of James N. Gillett, the very admirable man that he is, and that his final conclusions are those of The Interests that secured political preferment for him under bond to do nothing rash? To a man up a tree it looks that way.

Out of the Frying Pan Plump Into the Fire There is small likelihood that, were amendment number one submitted and adopted as it is, the courts would not hold that the words, "the year ending" should be construed to be in the amendment, inasmuch as their being left out was manifestly the error of some careless clerk. But what will the courts say of the power of an extra session of a legislature to recall an amendment already submitted to the people by a regular session? Can the extra session rescind the act of a former session and so withdraw the amendment as first submitted and submit a second in its place? Or will it have to submit both forms, the amendment as it stands and the amendment as amended? Lawyers are guessing at it as hard as they can and, at this writing, it is not perfectly certain what the legislature will try to do with the conundrum. If it undertakes to do what some enemy of the amendment believes illegal, and he should proceed to enjoin the Secretary of State against promulgating it, its last condition might be worse than its first. However, there is a general concurrence of sentiment to the effect that if the amendment is somehow submitted to the people and they do adopt it that will cure all defects in the manner of its submission, but it looks like a good deal of expense to go to to avoid a technical defect that nearly all lawyers think the courts would pass over lightly, the more certainly that the courts are likely to look upon the reforms proposed by it with much favor.

A Tight Cinch On The Amendment As It Is The advisers of the Governor evidently do not intend to have the extra session "do things" to that amendment beyond supplying the missing "the year ending." The Governor's proclamation calls the legislature together in extraordinary session for the sole purpose of submitting amendment number one to the people in the words following to wit: etc., etc.; then follows the amended amendment in corrected form, the idea being that the text of the amendment be not "monkeyed" with, even to the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i" more or less. Now there is a fine legal question for legal gentlemen to moot. Can the Governor limit the power of the legislature to doing the specific thing he wants done in the specific way he wants it done? Or can the legislature go at that amendment de novo and lick it into better shape before resubmitting it? If it can it should, and for at least two reasons. It is outrageous to require a three-fourths vote for the legislature to change the rate of taxation in any instance at any time. It means minority rule with a vengeance. It would be a proper safeguard in the interests of stability, and to prevent eternal tinkering and cinch bills, to require more than a majority vote to change what the people as a whole have adopted as fair. So far as we may judge from what has thus far been said this three-fourths clause is the greatest hindrance to the enactment of the amendment. It should be changed to two-thirds and this extra session should make that change, the gubernatorial "cinch" to the contrary notwithstanding. The second objection to the amendment as it is, is that the banks brought pressure upon the legislature to reduce their rate of taxation from one per cent on their capital stock, surplus and undivided profits to six-tenths of one per cent, a concession that should not have been made and which the legislature should take this opportunity to restore to the one per cent rate. That also would help to carry the amendment. The Watchman hopes that the legislature will feel free to deal with that amendment as, after due reflection, it feels that it ought to, notwithstanding any pressure in the proclamation to leave it just as it is.

When Will California Do the Right Thing? The referendum—and that is what amendments of the constitution piecemeal amount to—will never work satisfactorily until the referring is rightly done. California's system shows how not to do it. Oregon has the better way and one of the first pieces of constructive legislation taken hold of should be to adopt or adapt the Oregon plan. Instead of submitting the amendments just as they stand to the voters on a sheet received with their sample ballots, a few days before election, when it is too late to give the subjects needed study, Oregon prepares a pamphlet in which the amendments and the arguments for and against the adoption of each of them are succinctly set forth by those who are for and those who are opposed to them. This gives the voter an opportunity to inform himself and do it in season. In addition to this system the people of Oregon are forming clubs and hiring speakers to make the circuit of the state to talk to them regarding all the issues upon which they are to pass judgment at the ensuing election. This preparatory work, supplemented by discussions for and against in the press of a state, cannot fail of creating the most intelligent and informed voting constituency conceivable, and if Oregon follows that system with efficiency and zeal, it will come to lead the civic thought of the nation. Of course these advances did not take place in Oregon until that state had freed itself from Herrin domination, and it was too much to expect any such good to come out of California while under that yoke, but, with freedom already in sight, all these good things, and more, will become possible in California also.

The Mix-Up In The Printing The law requires the Secretary of State to have printed and distributed to the clerks of the several counties, for distribution to the voters, one and one-half times as many copies of all constitutional amendments as there are registered voters in the state. The Secretary of State has estimated the registered vote of the state to be 600,000, which will mean 900,000 copies. The law says that the amendments shall be printed on "a sheet," or in the form of a pamphlet. To get the work done in good season the State Printer started the printing some time before the extra session was called to submit the Panama Exposition amendments and got well along toward the end when a halt was called by reason of the Panama-Pacific additions.

Then the question arose as to whether "a sheet" meant two sheets and legal opinion leaned to the conclusion that the less certainly included the greater inasmuch as it is a poor rule that does not work both ways and it has never been disputed that the greater includes the less easy enough, so the printing was gone ahead with, using a second little sheet with the Panama-Pacific exposition amendments on the second sheet.

Now comes the discovery of the omission in amendment number one with a probable necessity of doing all the printing over again on a single sheet as the law requires. Meantime, the appropriation of $4,000 made by the legislature to cover the cost of printing has been well-nigh exhausted. The joke is on the taxpayer.

The opening day of the exposition brought many street beggars to the city. At the corner of the Federal building sat an old man blind and minus one leg. When the parade was passing a sympathetic lady stopped and gazed at him in pity. Finally she approached him and began asking him questions. She asked him if he were married, how many children he had, where he had worked last, how he had met with the accident that had incapacitated him for work, and a thousand other questions. Finally the unfortunate one became peevish. "Madame," he exclaimed harshly, "you may think this is an information bureau. It is not; it is a collecting agency." —Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

THE TRIAL OF HALSEY

After less than two days of effort, a jury was secured, last Saturday, to try Theodore V. Halsey on a charge of offering a bribe to former Supervisor Max Mamlock to vote for a Home Telephone Company franchise. The jury thus speedily obtained consisted of George C. Smart, Edward Standquist, Julian Brock, Frank Elgin, William H. Manuel, G. Gaetcke, A. V. Franzi, Martin Hanson, Joseph Rubin, George D. Lucy, Albert Meyer and Isaac Levinger. The defense used seven peremptory challenges, and the state but one.

The trial proper began on Monday morning, and the verdict of acquittal was rendered Wednesday evening, so it will be noticed that less than five days were consumed from the calling of the first prospective juror to the verdict of acquittal. When Francis J. Heney was an active factor in the district attorney's office trials took longer, but they displayed a tendency to terminate in other than verdicts of acquittal.

The main witnesses for the prosecution were former Supervisors Max Mamlock, Charles Boston, Fred B. Nicholas and Daniel G. Coleman. Mamlock testified that he was offered and received $7,000 in two payments from the defendant, Halsey, to vote for a franchise for the Home Telephone Company. The other witnesses also testified to receiving sums of money from the defendant for the same purpose. Cross-examination endeavored to develop the fact that the money in each case was paid under extortion. No attempt was made by the prosecution to show how the sums of money thus obtained were used, or in any manner to trace it. F. W. Eaton testified that Halsey hired the office in which the money is said to have been paid.

The defendant, Halsey, did not take the witness stand in his own behalf, and consequently did not deny that he offered a bribe, as charged. For the defense, Lieutenant-Governor Warren Porter, State Senator C. M. Belshaw, Judge Hiram Tuttle of Santa Clara county and others testified to the defendant's good reputation. Other witnesses testified to the bad reputation for truth and veracity of the main witnesses for the prosecution, and this ended the defense.

At the close of Judge Seawell's charge to the jury the latter retired, and, at the end of twelve ballots, agreed upon a verdict of acquittal. It is reported that the first ballot stood nine for acquittal and three for conviction, but those who believed the defendant guilty gradually came to the conclusion that he was a maligned and innocent man.

Thus it will be seen that this trial moved off swimmingly and terminated in one of those triumphant verdicts of acquittal which were obtained with such difficulty when Mr. Heney was here. Probably congratulations should be extended to Mr. Halsey. It must be a great relief to him to learn from a jury of his peers that he bribed nobody.

PERSONALIA

Oliver Herford's latest is "Con & Co.," a farce adapted from the French. The Herford fancy is now running at the Nazimova theatre, New York.

Mrs. Minnie W. Rutherford of Magazine, Ark., has prepared a bill providing for the admission of women to the bar of Arkansas, and it will be presented at the next session of the state legislature. Mrs. Rutherford is the chairman of the legislative committee of the General Federation of Women's Clubs and national superintendent of the department of juvenile courts of the Woman's Temperance Union. She is a college graduate and has taken courses in several law schools.

There have been no deficits in the national budget of Mexico since that of 1895-96, a year or two after Limantour became minister of finance. Before then there was no budget without its deficit. For fourteen years past the excess of ordinary revenues over expenditures annually has ranged from $800,000 to $29,000,000. The surplus in 1909 was nearly $5,900,000. The aggregate surpluses since Limantour took charge of Mexico's purse have totalled more than $136,000,000. Of this $61,000,000 has been devoted to public works and the remaining $75,000,000 converted into a cash reserve.

THE TAX REFORM AMENDMENT

By Carl C. Plehn

Article No. 4

In the previous articles it has been shown that the evils of the present system of taxation are sufficiently serious to arouse deep concern. As a local issue tax reform overshadows all others. The following articles will deal with the remedy proposed in the amendment.

If one thing is clear it is that the piling of the state tax on top of the local taxes is the first cause of the tax evils under which we labor. The local system of taxation was especially designed for the division of neighborhood charges among neighbors and is not adapted for the apportionment of other public expenses. Hence it becomes clear that the first step in tax reform is to get rid of the state tax. Then and then only will it be possible to adjust the local charges with a single eye to justice between man and man.

This was discovered forty years ago in Pennsylvania, many years ago in Connecticut, more recently in Wisconsin, Minnesota, Virginia, New Jersey and in other states. New York for example worked for thirty years toward this end, which she has only recently attained. In short, every state that can claim the advancement that our state has achieved has won separation of state from local taxation.

Professor Seligman of Columbia University, in reviewing recently his many years of study of the American system of taxation, said:

"The separation of state and local revenues is therefore a matter of vital importance in the American commonwealths of today, not so much because it forms in itself any solution of the problem, but because it is the indispensable initial step to any substantial progress. The separation of state and local revenues is not a cure, but it alone will make a cure possible. It is from this point of view that we must address ourselves to the problem.

"The problems of taxation in the United States are becoming every year more complex. In order to solve them we must keep in mind the ultimate goal, and be prepared to take the first step. The ultimate goal is the accommodation of fiscal methods to our changed economic conditions. The first step is the separation of state and local revenues."

There is property that is local in character, like real estate, and there is property that is general in character, of which we may take the railroads as an illustration. Local government is nearest to the local property, while the general functions of the state should be supported by the taxation of property general in character.

Separation of state from local taxation along these lines will place the taxation of the large corporations in the hands of the larger governing body of the state and leave the smaller units of property to be taxed locally, for those activities of government by which it most directly and intimately benefits.

The local assessors will no longer be called upon to serve two masters, the state and their own home constituents, whose interests are opposed.

If in addition we can substitute in the administration of the state taxes a mathematical rule in place of the "discretionary judgment" of any officer or boards we shall make an additional gain.

All of these advantages will accrue under the tax reform amendment. In addition to that we shall be rid of the necessity for "equalization," so-called, between the counties, a process that not only arouses bitter hostilities, but in the end aggravates the very evils it was designed to cure.

The succeeding articles will deal with the taxation of the different classes of corporations.

Article No. 5

The first of these articles gave an outline of the amendment; the second and third discussed the evils of the present system; the fourth advanced the reasons for separation of state from local taxation. With this article begins the discussion of the specific measures proposed.

It is hardly necessary to state that if we are going to afford any relief to the over-taxed farmer and the over-taxed owner of a small piece of real estate, we must increase the taxes that somebody else has to pay. In this sense and in several other respects this is a part of a world-wide struggle. The author of these articles has just returned from a year spent in Europe in the study of the tax reform problems that are the great issues in England, Germany and France. As summarized in an address that he presented before the Royal Economic Society in London the essence of the tax reform problem is the same everywhere, no matter how its outer aspects may differ. It is an effort to make the tax system keep pace with the rapid changes in industry and commerce; to reach the new resources that are continually springing up outside the old taxes. Thus in England, where land was freed from taxation a century ago by a compromise, the present problem is to make the landowners pay on the increase in the value of their lands. This is a struggle that threatens to involve the very existence of the House of Lords. In France the effort is to establish a new income tax that shall reach the taxable resources of the bourgeoisie. In Germany the problem takes a form not unlike our own. It is to make the large aggregations of wealth pay their share. In each case new taxable resources have grown up outside the old tax system.

With us it is how to make what we call "the corporations" pay more. So long as corporate property that pervades the whole state is taxable in sections by local assessors, each of whom can see no more, perhaps, than a few miles of rails or of wires, and each of whom is more concerned for his own little group of constituents than for any ideal of justice, no rational taxation of corporation property can be expected.

A single example must serve. Until 1880 the railroads were assessed and taxed in each county separately. Their taxes were not very large, and were often determined by compromises with the county authorities. If the company thought that a given county was asking too much it simply refused to pay and the authorities of the county were glad to compromise on any figure that the road would pay. After 1880, under the new constitution, the taxation of the railroads was placed in the hands of a state board. Years of litigation followed, but in the end the state won and established the principle that a railroad could be assessed as a whole and need not be assessed in little twenty mile strips whose value in the eyes of the little local assessors reached a vanishing point just as the rails themselves do when one looks down a straight piece of track. But even after that the state board had no rule to follow except to count the ties, measure the rails, and count the cars and locomotives, and then guess at the rest. But in 1906, at the suggestion of the commission on revenue and taxation, the board adopted the idea that the earnings of the roads were an indication of the value of the property and as a result the assessed value of railroad property has been very nearly doubled. The railroad companies have for four years, now, paid taxes on a plan which approximates that of the amendment. If there had been a flaw in the reasoning by which this result was reached the attorneys for the companies would not have consented to this increase in taxation, and we may rest assured that the $1,250,000 of annual taxes that have gone into the state, the county and the city treasuries from this source would never have been paid.

So much for the railroads; but there is very much more that ought to be had from other classes of corporations. We hope to get that after the adoption of this amendment. Take the state tax off the small property owners and turn over to the big state government the taxation of the big corporations; give the state officer who is to administer the new taxes a simple rule to follow that does not leave any latitude for the exercise of discretionary judgment and we can hope for as good results as have already been temporarily won in the case of the railroads. The state has already shown that it can handle the railroads better than did the little assessors in the counties and cities. By the same sign it can do as well with the others.

"Family all back from the summer trip?" "Yes." "I hear your wife is confined to her room. What does the doctor say?" "We haven't employed a doctor. The laundress promises to have her out in about four days." —Louisville Courier-Journal.

TAFT'S POKER STORY

Here is a story credited to the President by a caller at the Taft cottage at Beverly, says the New York Sun:

A governor of Colorado (of course not the present governor) and a friend were playing euchre. The hands had just been dealt and the governor's friend looked at his and sighed:

"I wish I was playing poker."

"Is that so?" said the governor indifferently, licking the broken wrapper of his cigar. "How much would you bet?"

"I'd bet $100 on this hand," said the friend.

"Well," said the governor yawning, "you must have a good hand." Then squinting at a queen that was lying on the table he added: "I think I might take you on if I had that queen."

"Take it," said the governor's friend, which the governor did and promptly bet $1,000. His friend saw him and dropped four kings. The governor laid down four aces and a lone queen.

"It's your money," said the friend after he had recovered, "but will you tell me what the deuce you wanted of that queen?"

President Taft himself doesn't play poker, but he knows enough about the game to appreciate how largely human nature figures in it, and it was in illustration of this point that he is said to have told the story.

OAKLAND'S WATERFRONT CRISIS

THE INGENIOUS BUT NOT INGENUOUS PLEA OF THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD

By HENRY C. McPIKE

There is a matter pending before the Oakland City Council, a matter of vast importance to the city of Oakland, and of deep interest to all the people of the state. The attention that it has attracted is by no means commensurate with its far reaching effects and consequences. For more than half a century there has been waged between the legislative bodies of the town and city of Oakland, on one side, and the courts of the state and nation on the other, a controversy which has had for its determination the ownership and control of what is commonly known as the Oakland water front.

The Carpenter Grant

In 1852, when Oakland was incorporated as a little village, situated on the northerly bank of the estuary of San Antonio and far inland from the bay, a far-sighted individual by the name of Horace W. Carpenter, obtained from the shortsighted members of the town council a conveyance of its entire water front; that is to say, of all of the land over which the tide ebbed and flowed, around the entire boundary of the town. The consideration for this grant was the erection of a wharf at the foot of Main street, now Broadway, and a school-house.

Two years later the city of Oakland, the successor of the town of Oakland, was incorporated. It denied the validity of the grant to Carpenter and of all of the proceedings thereafter taken by him to reinforce his title. It instituted a number of suits to invalidate the grant, but never succeeded in obtaining any substantial benefits from any of this litigation saying that in a decision by Chief Justice Beatty of the Supreme Court a definite line fixing the limits of the grant to Carpenter was made in 1897.

Enter the Southern Pacific

After this decision of Judge Beatty, the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky, claiming to be the successor in interest of Carpenter, commenced an action against the Western Pacific Railway Company in the Circuit Court of the United States, for the northern district of California, laying claim to that part of the water front lately occupied by the Western Pacific Railway Company for which an ordinance of the City Council had been passed. The case was decided by the Circuit Court in favor of the Southern Pacific Company, enjoining the Western Pacific from proceeding with its occupancy. The case was taken on appeal by the latter company to the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, and the decision of the Circuit Court was reversed. It was by the Circuit Court of Appeals decided that the claim of the Southern Pacific Company to any of the lands or water front occupied by the Western Pacific was without any foundation and, moreover, that its own occupancy of the entire premises lying west of the low tide lines recognized and established by Judge Beatty (that is to say, a large part of the Oakland Mole, with the slips and depot building) was merely at the sufferance of the city of Oakland and of the State of California. The reasoning of Judge Gilbert, who wrote the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals, was so cogent and convincing that the Southern Pacific Company abandoned all hope of being able to overcome it by an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and on the 19th day of April, 1908, not having in the meantime filed any notice of appeal, the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals became forever final.

S. P. Occupancy Jeopardized

Now, by this decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, the Southern Pacific Company was placed in a very precarious position. All of its property on the mole, and its fine depot, at the end of it, was held and is now held entirely at the mercy of the Oakland City Council. It is true it owns the land lying between high tide and low water mark or ship channel, but beyond that, it has no rights, whatever, that the City Council is bound in any way to regard.

By the constitution of the state, Article 15, Section 2, it is provided that, "No individual, partnership or corporation claiming or possessing the frontage or tidal lands of a harbor, bay, inlet, estuary or other navigable water in this state, shall be permitted to exclude the right of way to such water, whenever it is required for any public purpose, nor to destroy or obstruct the free navigation of such water." Taking this decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, and the above article of the constitution of California, coupled with the fact that the franchise of the Southern Pacific Company (or of its grantors to the Seventh street local line), will expire in about fourteen months, the Southern Pacific Company finds itself in a sad predicament. The Seventh street franchise would be of little value without access to the ferry privileges, and at any moment the railroad company might find itself required to pay rent for the mole and depot or have it declared a nuisance and an obstruction to the free access of the city of Oakland to the navigable waters of the bay. In this condition it filed a petition before the council of the city of Oakland for a franchise granting to it in large measure nearly everything that it thought it possessed up to the time of the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals.

What the S. P. Is Trying to Grab

Instead of appearing before the council in its true condition, that of a mere suppliant for favors, it assumed the position rather of a benefactor. It offered to do nine things which it chose to designate as conditions:

First, it was to pay to the city of Oakland, as rent, for its extensive privileges on the water front, extending along the line of about 2,300 feet of the very choicest part, lying outside of the bulkhead line, the sum of $125 per month—or about as much as the top floor of the old city hall would rent for—for the first twenty-five years of the privilege, and about $250 a month for the remaining twenty-five years. Considering that the company pays about $8,000 a month for 250 feet front at the Ferry building in San Francisco, and $1,300 a month for one freight slip in San Francisco, besides $70,000 a year tolls for freight entered at the same slip, its offers to Oakland are more than laughable.

S. P.'s Second Generous Offer

Second: The railroad company offers to relinquish and convey to Oakland all of its claim and right to Broadway street extended southerly, from First street, to the southern boundary line of the city, and Broadway wharf, within the limits of Broadway extended southerly to the United States pierhead line. A glance at the official map will show that this claim by the railroad company to the ownership of any property or right, at the end of Broadway, is without any foundation in fact. What they claim to own begins beyond the low tide line and extends over land the title to which is in the state, and under the provision of the constitution above referred to their obstructions there constitute a nuisance as against the city of Oakland.

Third: They offer to remove the long wharf, which extends far out towards Goat island, within eight years after the granting of the privilege. This is another gratuity on the part of the railroad, for in eight years time the teredo will remove the wharf for them, and, besides, it is now and has been a structure placed upon lands covered by water over which the railroad company never had any claim or right whatsoever. The state can remove it, at pleasure, and the United States government has already threatened to do so, and it is only in hopes that the federal government might have its hand withdrawn from this structure by a request got up in this way from the City Council that the railroad has any hopes at all of keeping the structure there.

Bulkhead Offer Benefits Only S. P.

Fourth: They offer to apply within six months after the granting of the privilege or ordinance to the Secretary of War for permission to construct a bulkhead of a permanent character running parallel with the line of the mole. They are careful to say nothing about doing anything more than making the application, and whether such privilege will be granted or not will depend, first, upon the condition of mind of the Secretary of War, and upon the manner it may be in which the request shall be lodged. In any event, the building of the bulkhead, with its apron, and the pier filled in behind it, would be of no use to any one save the railroad itself.

Fifth: They offer to keep an open slip or water space three hundred feet wide alongside of the bulkhead and to dredge it to a depth of 30 feet below mean tide line. What possible benefit the city of Oakland could derive from this no one could imagine.

Sixth: They offer to allow the decision rendered by the Circuit Court of Appeals, in March, 1907, to "remain final." That decision has been final since the 19th of April, 1908, and the offers of the railroad company to allow it to remain so cannot be made with any sincerity. They are simply playing upon the credulity of the City Council.

Brooklyn Harbor Line Change

Seventh: They offer to apply or join with the city of Oakland in an application to the Secretary of War to change the location of the harbor line across the northern arm of the estuary that lies between Oakland and Brooklyn. One would imagine from this offer if he did not know the inwardness of it that some kind of a benefit was to be conferred on the people. But far from it. Between the Twelfth street bridge or mole, that crosses between Oakland and Brooklyn, there is a channel of the estuary where the tide ebbs and flows, upon the east side of which there is a strip of about three-quarters of a mile in length which was never included in the original grant to Carpenter and over which the railroad company never had any jurisdiction. This three-quarters of a mile, if dredged out, would form a fine wharfing privilege where all kinds of freight might be delivered and received. The government of the United States would never grant a permit to a private individual or corporation to close access to it, but the war department might grant a request from a municipality, and knowing this, the railroad has cunningly injected into this offer a kind of proposition to become partners with the city of Oakland in making the request to the Secretary of War. The main object of the railroad company in proposing to close up this channel, save only of a narrow aqueduct to furnish Lake Merritt with water, is done for the purpose of avoiding the necessity of putting in drawbridges, and also for the purpose of cutting off that much water competition. Another consideration not to be lost sight of is the fact that right here on that northeastern corner bounded on the south by the main estuary and on the west by the channel of the north arm, would be presented a splendid terminus for another railroad entering the city.

Street Opening and Stratton Patent

Eighth: The railroad company offers to dedicate a street 80 feet wide extending from First and Chestnut streets westerly over the tide lands of the railroad company to what little of the water front may be left to the city between the holdings of the Western Pacific on the south and the Southern Pacific on the north. This offer is really a singular proposition, when it is considered that, without it, the City Council have the power under Article 15, Section 2, of the state constitution to open, not one street, but a dozen, if it so desires, to its water front, regardless of the wishes or without the let or hindrance of the railroad company.

Ninth: The railroad company offers to relinquish and quitclaim unto the city of Oakland all lands held or claimed by it under what is known as the "Stratton Patent."

When it is considered that the title to these lands is very gravely in doubt in the first place, and secondly that the holdings of the railroad company constitute a long triangular piece of less than 2 acres in extent and are occupied almost exclusively by its tracks, its relinquishment to the city is a fitting end of all of the nine conditions which open with a proposition to pay the city $125 a month for the first twenty-five years of its holdings from the city.

Of course, the railroad company will escape many of the vicissitudes of competition and place itself beyond the contingencies consequent upon an ever-shifting appraisement by the City Council of the value of the possessions of the railroad company as the city increases in population and power, by the granting of this franchise, and it is not to be wondered at that it has used its utmost endeavors to try to convince the people of Oakland and the City Council that it has something to offer for the vast privileges and rights that it expects to receive in return, but if the City Council will sit down and analyze this proposed franchise, they will see what a hollow sham all the offers of the railroad company are.

A Cold-Blooded Business Proposition

It is a plain proposition of business, ought to be dealt with in that same spirit of cool calculation which the railroad company itself exercises in all of its business transactions, and if the City Council will show itself alive to this situation and act with only a small part of the business acumen which they individually make use of in their own daily transactions, they will succeed in retaining and realizing for the people all the benefits which the city is entitled to for these great privileges and at the same time do no injustice to the railroad company or anyone else, for the company will be paying value for value received.

When it is considered that the railroad company, stating the case in its most favorable light for it, has been for twenty-one years occupying without let or hindrance the finest piece of water front on the western coast of the American continent that belonged all the while to a municipal corporation, to whom it has never paid a dollar of rent, is it not time that it should be called upon to pay at least a reasonable rent henceforward for what it receives?

THE ROMANCE OF BOOKS

A writer in the London Globe has traced out some facts of curious interest in the history of books. He says:

Books play a very important role in the journey from the cradle to the grave—they are by no means the least of the things that tend to make life worth living. Indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that the love of books is a passion that nothing but death can quench. And this attribute was displayed by Mark Twain, whose last moments of consciousness were spent in the endeavor to read one of his favorite passages in his favorite book—Carlyle's "French Revolution." Another illustration of "the ruling passion strong in death" was afforded by another humorist. When James Russell Lowell and all his friends knew well that for him the silver cord of life would soon be loosed, Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes went out to pay him a last visit at his home at Elmwood. The two brilliant men of letters had always been like brothers, calling each other by their first names. As the doctor entered the room he said, in his usual benignant and breezy way, "Well, James, how are you today?" And Lowell, book in hand, looked up with a bright smile as he answered, "Wendell, I do not know how I am, and I don't care. I am reading Scott's 'Rob Roy.'"

Sometimes the fascination of fiction is shown in other curious ways. For instance, when "Dombey and Son" was being published in serial form the eagerness of the American public to follow the thread of the story could not be satisfied. There were no cables in those days, and news as well as merchandise had to be sent by boat. When Dickens had proceeded so far with the interesting story as to bring little Paul into a condition between life and death the ship that brought the next number, containing the continuation of the narrative, was met as she drew up at the pier by an anxious crowd waiting for tidings of the fate of little Paul. But we need not go across the Atlantic for examples of the intense interest that was taken in the fate of Paul Dombey. In England coaches were intercepted on their way from London to provincial towns, and the booksellers' parcels ransacked for the green-covered monthly number, while passengers from town were eagerly questioned, "What about little Paul?" One recalls, too, a story of a book of the past. The inhabitants of an English village set the church bell a-ringing when, having read with breathless interest some eight or nine volumes of Richardson's "Clarissa Harlowe," they found that in the tenth or eleventh the heroine was about to be happily married.

And not infrequently the popularity of some books has been so great that the free lending libraries have been besieged by those anxious to purchase copies. Mrs. Burnett's delightful "Little Lord Fauntleroy" was a case in point. People almost went crazy over it, and even stern old maids would unbend and dignified young ladies would lose all sense of decorum when they were wanting it. They would wait for hours outside the libraries for the borrowers who were returning the copies, and watch them safely back, so that they could be among the first to take them out again. The vigilance exercised in "spotting" their return was worthy of a better cause, and there were often serious thoughts of calling in the services of the police, for it seemed sometimes as though the clamoring claimants would not stop at physical force if thereby they might obtain the books. A somewhat similar state of things occurred in many places when Hall Caine's "Manxman" was published. In Edinburgh the most extraordinary demand sprang up for it at the libraries. A lady on asking for the book in one of these was delighted when told she could have it if willing to be the eighteenth in turn, for, she said, "I've tried three libraries before and the lowest turn I could get anywhere is the ninetieth!"

There are, however, few phases of the romance of books so interesting as the origins of famous works—as will be apparent from a couple of illustrations. Soon after "Treasure Island" had appeared and attracted public attention to Robert Louis Stevenson two gentlemen were traveling up to London from

[The author of "Skid Puffer" read "The White Attendant" in The California Weekly of September 10th, and criticized it as tautological in wording and obvious in plot. We should be glad to have our readers write us their opinion of the relative merits of the two versions.—The Editor]

A MORE weird, dissociated horseback ride perhaps no one ever knew. I was dumbly proceeding along a vast desert, which, in the ashen moonlight, seemed altogether horizonless. Whence I came and whither bound I then did not know. There had been no farewells that I could recall and now there were no ends, no bounds, no direction. I felt the rise and fall of my galloping mustang's body, and dreamily heard the beat of its hoofs. Up and down, rise and fall, I felt the insistent, oscillating urge; beat on beat, monotonous, in ceaseless recurrent rhythm, I oppressively heard the intervallic clatter on the floor of the endless waste. It had been thus in my guideless galloping, hour after hour, without pause, without slackening, without direction, the full moon in heartless radiance casting our long, bobbing, beckoning shadows ahead—writhing, unreachable shadows—pointing on to the indiscriminate Beyond.

I leaned low over my pommel in utter weariness, dumbly bewildered, filled half consciously with an impending, indefinable oppression. I wondered why I was chasing those unreachable, inescapable shades. Wondered why they bobbed up and down so, where they were leading me. Why did they run away so swiftly? Why was I chasing so fast? They began to edge slowly into my consciousness as demonish guides.

I was aroused with a newly risen desert wind at my back, icily cold, but rising, falling, like the shadows there. Was it after me? I shuddered and urged my mustang to a faster gait. But as yet I could not understand.

The full moon's increasing light beat back the narrowed circle of the desert glooms, disclosing still wider, undelimited vistas before and behind, of waste and famine and death. The far front horizon, duskiy limned, rose ghostly. I sat up now, brushed my eyes, tried to think more clearly, to see more distinctly, but the heartless light melted into the featureless dusk. I strained my vision ahead, awakened to a livelier consciousness, tried to rouse my senses to know where I was, to understand the meaning of it all. But only the starved sage, the stunted cactal growths, the haunting distances, there the spectral yucca, here the imploratory arms of the saguaro, a coyote loping like a dancing feather, the devil play of the shadows under my mustang's nose, the receding specter of the front horizon line.

I did not know where I was in that indelimitable immensity with its emptiness, its ominous silences. My mustang was not running in a level speed, no; gallop, gallop, on and on, the rhythmic beat, the intervallic bobbing, the squeak of the saddle leathers, the steadily intermittent clink of the lariat rings, and oh how weary, inexpressibly weary I am! I bend over the pommel, lower, lower, my eyes seem impelled to close.

Now I lose sense of the lariat rings, the squeak of the stirrup straps, the stertorous burst of the mustang, the hoof beats are vanishing slowly out of my mind. Like a cowboy I must have been asleep in the saddle, but in a gallop.

I jerked awake; something was following me. I felt it, knew it, but dared not look behind—not yet. It was a presence, something above and swooning along silently, menacingly behind. The horse was running through heavier sand, the hoof beats were gone, the silence was supreme. We seemed to be swinging through the air with the jarless motion of a great ship in a becalmed sea. I crouched over my saddle, tense-eared, listening for a bark, a howl, the confused ravening hunger cries of the desert pack. Nothing, nothing but the felt, far-off presence slowly gaining on me.

My exhausted body began to stiffen, my nerves sang with suspense and deadly fear. My mustang threw his ears backward as if his finer sense had heard the silent swim of the thing behind. I bent lower on my animal's neck, the air roared past my ears, and I shot erect, aghast at the sight of fresh blood on my hands. My God! Where had I been? What had I done? I had to grasp my pommel with both hands to keep from reeling off my animal. Now I knew I was awake and not insane, but this suspense would drive me mad.

I crouched lower still and began to twist my head backward, around, over my shoulder—a little further, yet still a little more; directly one eye caught a glance of—my God! I did not know what. It was a devil thing. It had mightily flaring blood streaked wings and in their center at its front were two huge, bulging, phosphorescent balls of molten greenish-red fire.

Screeching I belied my mustang's neck, stiffened with horror and closed my eyes. My animal, experienced in savage warfare on the plains, felt my cover and raged with the last ounce of power of his body in flight. I bent upward, clutched my hands in his mane and kicked my spurs again and again in his throbbing flanks.

I do not know how long I clung and clutched there, expecting every moment to see the reflection of the thing's eyes on the sands about me and to feel the beginning clutch in my ribs. Oh! that prolonged agony of suspense, waiting—waiting—for that desert thing.

Fear and the hope of escape were the only emotions in my mind. But even they, somehow, cleared my brain. I knew this devil thing of the waste could not be an ignis fatuus, a moonlight mirage, a will o' the wisp in the dry, thirst-filled desert. But it was a fact in my consciousness just as sure as that I was alive; just as insistent, as inescapable as those demon figures under my mustang's nose.

I knew in every fiber of my being that it was getting closer all the time. I despairingly began to search for the reflection of its eyes, on my horse's neck, on the bushes swimming behind, on the sands below racing with me in endless course. I strained to hear the tense tremor of its wings, and I am ashamed to write that twice I thought I heard the champing of teeth like those of a fighting boar.

Suddenly I saw directly ahead something that looked like a long, low red lake, that fused into the impenetrable darkness of the mountains beyond. Then I recall that I mumbled exultingly, screamed with a sibilant shriek on my animal's sweaty neck. I was so senseless with horror that I scarcely knew what I did but there was a concept in my throbbing head that this was somehow like another red sea that overwhelmed another savage pursuing host two thousand years ago.

At once, almost, my mustang plunged into a long flat of red alkali dust that rose stormily in crimson clouds and enveloped me. Exulting under my breath, but still half paralyzed with dread and suspense, I rode on and on, now and then senselessly spurring my laboring animal and beating it ragingly with my fists.

I reached the edge of the flat and rode out on the hard ground, whirled around and saw the desert thing intermittently, here, there, dipping, crossing, circling around like a great desert eagle for its dropped prey, hunting for its escape. And as the moon shone on the edges and rims and up-rolling clouds, the thing seemed to be hunting in a raging sea of blood.

I felt almost safe in the blackness on the shadow side of the low mountains and, as I clattered along the trail of their western side, I felt that I had escaped those shadows before, the thing itself behind, but the saddle rings and squeakings and hoof beats were most accursedly loud. All at once, I saw that the road forked and the right one, I dimly discerned, extended through a short but climbing mountain pass. Soon I had the body of the mountain between me and the red lake. Up, up rose the highway, the mountain trail. I passed out almost at the crest and the sun came bursting into my face. It was morning and the cattle on a thousand swells, valleys and long plains were biting at the grass. Ground sparrows were chattering in the sage and tree choysas, and there were a thousand invigorating odors of the resurrections of early spring. The transition from darkness to light made me feel as if I had been suddenly flung out of hell into paradise.

I stood up in my stirrups and yelled; fired my revolver in the soft air; patted my mustang's streaming neck and scraped the foam and blood from its still throbbing flanks.

Ahead of me a mile away I saw familiar range sheds and barns; great cattle corrals, and the desert windmills, gayly turning in the soft morning air. I sat awry in my saddle to rest myself, and my emotions were so exaltant, I waved my hands to cattle that had stopped browsing to stare. I knew those cattle as well as I did my animal. How glad I was, foolishly glad to be with them once more.

As my tired pony pitty-patted on the hard range road, I tried to think, to understand. My mind even yet, when I reflected, was in a whirl. I turned my head carelessly back on the road I had come. I instantly congealed with terror. Here came the Desert Thing, paler, pop-eyed, hungry looking, humming with the speed of its flight. It was more subdued, as if tired and almost exhausted but—coming. I hope my Maker will never allow me to go through the agony of that last mile again. I can not at all describe it. All that I knew, till I came to the horse trough, was that I clung to the saddle pommel screaming, and so weak I almost toppled out of my saddle. Just as I reached the watering trough my loyal mustang reeled, plunged headlong and the blood streaming from a burst artery, it fell tumblingly to the earth. I flew on, I lit, tumbled, rolled and slashed up against the bunkhouse, my feet high up among the morning glory vines. There I lay stunned, half killed.

Now I hear voices about me; what is that familiar tone saying?

"Bob, Bob! Get up. Got to finish the round-up to-day. Here! I am the doctor. Take this. Bob! Bo-ob! Get up. Good lord what a time them boys must 'a' had last night. They must 'a' drank a bar'l."

Norfolk. One of them was reading "Treasure Island." Presently, having finished the book, he dropped it into his traveling bag, remarking, "Well, I think I could myself write a better child's story than that." The other, who, by the way, was his brother, urged him to try. Six weeks afterward the former handed to the latter a complete tale in manuscript. It was "King Solomon's Mines," the first novel that made a reputation for Mr. Rider Haggard. It was Mr. Henry James who suggested to the late George du Maurier that he should write novels. The artist-novelist once described the episode which was to make him as famous with the pen as he was with the brush. "It was one day while we were walking on Hampstead Heath. We were talking about story writing, and I said to him, 'If I were a writer, it seems to me that I should have no difficulty about plots. I have in my head now plots for fifty stories. I'm always working them out for my own amusement.' 'Well,' he said, 'it seems to me that you are a very fortunate person; I wish you'd tell me one of those plots.' Then I told him the story of 'Trilby.'"

After sitting very still for five minutes he said: "It beats all how it hurts me when that devil gets spanked." —The Delinquent.

Cards received here this morning announce the marriage yesterday of Chester Hill Waters of this city to Marie Lehman of Des Moines. The intelligence came as quite a surprise to the many friends of the young man here, who were unaware that he was contemplating anything of this character. He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Waters of Ringwood and was a very bright young man. —Clinton (Iowa) Advertiser.

They had argued long and furiously over the question, "Can a man marry his widow's niece!" and the highly talented lawyer in the corner had waxed eloquent over the marriage laws of every state in the union, every country in the world, civilized and uncivilized, and had cited the affinity tables of every church, and even the legislation of Lysurgus down to that of Brigham Young, when a young man quietly announced his intense desire to be informed where the deuce a man was when his wife was a widow? Then the discussion closed down, and fourteen excited controversialists ordered ice water. —New York Times.

On board an ocean liner were a lady and gentleman, accompanied by their young hopeful, aged 6, and as is usually the case the parents were very sick while little Willie was the weldest thing on board. One day the parents were lying in their steamer chairs hoping that they would die, and little Willie was playing about the deck. Willie did something of which his mother did not approve, so she said to her husband: "John, please speak to Willie." The husband with the little strength left in his wasted form, looked at his son and heir and feebly muttered, "How'dy do, Willie." —Lycumite.

Here is a story which Secretary of War Dickinson, who is from the south and a student of the negro, tells of how a colored man planned to save money when his brother died. The darky went to the station agent in his little town, which was about fifty miles from Memphis, Tenn., and asked solemnly: "Boss, how much is it to fetch a corpse from hyuh to Memphis?" The agent told him. "Well, boss, how much is it to fetch a corpse on a round trip from hyuh to Memphis?" This information was also given, but the agent added: "I never heard of carrying a corpse on a round trip." "Well, boss, you see, it's dis way," explained the darky: "dis hyuh corpse is my bruvver, an' we got a lot of kin folks up in Memphis. All dem kin folks would come down hyuh to look at de corpse, an' dey would des eat me outen house an' home. I thought I'd save money by fetchin' dis corpse up dar an' lettin' 'em take a look at him. Den I could brung him back and bury him quiet and peaceful." —Popular Magazine.

The State Board of Agriculture

If government were limited to protecting people in their rights, and then letting them have it out among themselves as best they may, there would be no State Board of Agriculture. Perhaps the loss might not be great in this instance, but there would be a loss. Such an institution has its warrant in the general welfare idea as applied to government and that idea is capable of doubling, quadrupling and then doubling and quadrupling again and again, the activities of government. The ultimatum, if we shall attain to it, will be a regulated, prearranged socialistic civilization in which the individual is swallowed up and lost in the shuffle as he is now in China and Japan. But there is no need that we shall reach the ultimatum, that we shall follow any idea to its consummation. We must not. We must go so far as it is prudent to go and there stop. Beware of the logical conclusion. It is the jumping off place.

When California was admitted to the Union it was commonly believed to have little agricultural value. It was so different from agriculture in other states that men were slow to grasp its possibilities. But it was not long before the urgent demand, in the mines, for fruits, vegetables and cereals set many to work tilling the soil and with no little success. The common welfare demanded agricultural development and legislation responded to the demand. In those days, there being so little property in the state to be taxed, funds for supporting the state were chiefly obtained by a system of licenses similar to those now imposed in cities and towns. The first aid to agriculture in California consisted in exempting from license taxes agricultural labor and the sale of agricultural products.

That was in 1852 and, that year, the State Agricultural Society was formed. Two years later it was incorporated by a special act of the legislature, and an appropriation of $5,000 a year for four years was made to aid agriculture in California. Fairs were held and prizes were offered, such as $500 for the first hundred bags of sugar made from sorghum or from cane, $3,000 for the first 100 bales of cotton, $1,000 for the first thousand bales of hops, $2,000 for the first ten bales of raw silk. This old State Agricultural Society was a voluntary organization, electing its own officers and it lasted until 1880, doing some very splendid work for the state, better it is commonly believed than has been done since.

But under the new constitution, adopted in 1879, the state was forbidden to grant money to any corporation for any purpose not specifically provided for in the constitution itself. So the old State Agricultural Society lost its voluntary character and became a state institution, its fourteen directors being appointed by the governor of the state, frequently by way of political recognition, instead of being elected by the volunteer members of the society. The old organization preserved its perpetuity by being known as the State Agricultural Society, but its directors, appointed by the governor, constitute the State Board of Agriculture, empowered to receive and expend appropriations of state moneys for advancing the agricultural interests of the state.

In some states it is no part of the business of the State Board of Agriculture to hold fairs. In California it is small part of its business to do anything else. It makes a bluff at collecting statistics, but they are inadequate. It holds a state fair annually at Sacramento, and state fairs are good. Their bane and their blessing is horse-racing. People like to see horses go. They always did, always will. Races draw the crowds, the crowds furnish the gate receipts, the gate receipts pay the premiums for agricultural exhibits. How to secure the blessing without the bane is the problem. The reader and the writer of this may thank their stars that they do not have to solve it. Racing without gambling is entertaining and not harmful, with gambling it is demoralizing and tends to swallow up the fair and monopolize its interest.

California needs to have its agriculture fostered, to have its agricultural resources conserved, its range of commodities broadened, its youth trained to love the soil, to preserve it, enrich it, hand it down to their successors better than they found it, for people must be fed until the end of time or there cannot be people. They will starve in California as in India and China.

California needs an agricultural department on lines similar to those of the Department of Agriculture of the United States which has expended more than a hundred million dollars of public money to advance the agricultural welfare of the nation. If California had such a department embracing all the activities now divided up among the State Board of Agriculture, the Horticultural Commissioner, State Veterinarian, Dairy Bureau, and some of the functions performed by the California College of Agriculture, order could be brought out of chaos and, by co-operation with the department at Washington, greater good could be gained with, perhaps, no greater cost than under our present uncoordinated system of public expenditure for the benefit of the farmer, the fruit grower and the stockman.

("Walter Macarthur"—Concluded)

offers of assistance to achieve office and the urging of those who believed that he was needed. He has entered the present race for congress with the feeling that he may possibly be able to demonstrate by his campaign that the public contempt of the office seeker is unjustified, and that a man can prove that office can be achieved by methods above reproach.

As to his politics, Macarthur has always been identified with the progressive element of the Democratic party in San Francisco. As national affairs now shape themselves, in the present division of congress on the line of progressivism as against standpatism, Walter Macarthur unmistakably and inevitably belongs with the progressive group. He has not been afraid to be unpopular in the past, and he would not fear it now. But it happens that he represents the progressive sentiment of the day in an ideal form. It so happens, also, that the Republicans of the Fourth Congressional District of California have nominated the incumbent, Julius Kahn, a Cannonite and standpatter of the most pronounced type. On that issue Walter Macarthur is the logical man for the fourth district. His kind of Democracy is infinitely nearer to progressive Republicanism than the Kahn kind of Republicanism. It is on that issue that the nation is now fighting the battle of the century. Walter Macarthur is with the right side. That side is victorious all over the union. It ought to be in the Fourth Congressional District of California.

Farmers' Week

BEGINNING NEXT MONDAY, at the State Farm at Davis, a school week will be devoted to showing the farmers of California how to prevent a California peasantry as an irremediable inheritance for their children's children if not for their own children. The man who knows how will be a landed proprietor. The man who does not, well, he'll take his place where he belongs in the ranks of those who, like the crofters, are incapable of making their condition either better or worse. We are bent, head-on, for as outrageous a system of rack-renting landlordism in this country as the world has known, and the issue on trial at Davis is as to whether the children of the farmers of this generation are to be landlords or tenants.

Robert M. La Follette

THE JOHN THE BAPTIST of our progressive Republicanism, Robert M. La Follette, has been subjected to the surgeon's knife to save his life. It will mean much to his country whether or not the patient survives a perfectly successful operation. They don't always. No doughtier David ever went up against any Goliath and, if he has not in fact cut off the head of the giant of privilege, he has walloped him soundly more than once. Here is hoping that he may live to repeat the chastisement. Four years ago Senator La Follette craved fifteen years more of life that he might finish the task of helping to restore free government to state and country. Never did a more glorious cause nerve the arm of a more valiant partisan!

A Business Proposition

FOR A RAILROAD TO CHARGE $2.50 for switching a car of freight on or off a private spur-track makes a nice little pick-up in addition to regular revenues. It is supposed that the commerce of San Francisco alone is mulcted to the extent of $200,000 a year in that way. But that is only a fraction of the problem. It has been surmised rather than estimated, perhaps, that if every car of freight in the United States so switched were charged accordingly, the added net revenue to the railroads would be something like $300,000,000 a year, which, capitalized at 5 per cent, would increase the market value of railroad stocks by $6,000,000,000. Never dismiss a corporation pick-up from the mind without first translating it into terms of stock quotation, for it is at the ticker end of every such transaction that its real significance becomes apparent.

A Question of Conscience

IT IS BEING DECLARED that whoever voted at a primary election thereby impliedly obligated himself to accept the results of that primary as a finality and to vote the ticket nominated without a scratch. It is not so. Any candidate that submits his name to a primary election impliedly obligates himself to abide the result, but not so the voter. He is as free after a primary as before, and good conscience requires him to make his ticket straight by scratching it until it is as straight as it can be made with the material offered him by all the tickets in the field. No voter will bolt the ticket of his party for a trivial reason, but only a trivial voter will refuse to bolt it when he has a good reason. The day of preprimary pledges, which shackle the wrists of honest men while dishonest shuck their handcuffs, has gone by, let us hope, never to return.

Where To Stick the Peg

ARTEFUL AGITATORS ARE STRIVING to set the nation by the ears over the century-old issue of states' rights. Our national good sense should save us from its being permitted. The call is not for dogmatism but for common sense. All can see that certain functions must be performed by the central government because they concern all the states in the Union, and it is as easy to perceive that other functions can best be performed by each state because each state alone is concerned. When any concrete case comes up the American people will be able to stick that particular peg exactly where it ought to go unless confused by dogmatic attempts to lay down as law that which is not law. Let us not permit our minds to be muddled regarding real issues by suffering false issues to be raised.

Reciprocity With Canada

NEGOTIATIONS ARE SOON TO OPEN between Washington and Ottawa relative to reciprocal tariff relations between the United States and Canada, and the President is said to be liberally minded toward the establishment of such relations. That is good, but the President will have a very active bourbonism on both sides of the line to contend with before the point is gained. Free trade between these two countries, with regard to the products of both countries, would prove an inestimable blessing to both the high contracting parties. And what is even more to the ultimate purpose, would mightily make for both countries becoming one country. Never should the concept of an ocean-bound republic be absent from the American mind, be that mind at Dawson or the Big Ditch.

Reno Hard Hit

THE NEW YORK COURT that decided that divorces granted in Reno are good only in Reno hit Reno's most profitable industry below the belt. It goes without saying that the divorce that one cannot get at home ought not to be good at home, but what of the divorcees who married and went off triumphantly with the other man or woman as soon as Reno had snipped the cord that bound them? Won't there be a jolly time taking the tangles out of American marital relations if the precedent established by the New York court is followed by courts in all the other states? Why shouldn't it? It seems founded in common sense, and is not law the perfection of common sense?

Why Not National?

WHY SHOULD NOT OFFENSES such as those growing out of the boughten election of Senator Lorimer, be taken cognizance of by the Department of Justice and the United States courts instead of by the courts and district attorneys in the counties where the offenses chanced to be committed? The good of the country demands that offenses against the country be confined to no jurisdictions smaller than the country. The senate committee has power to serve subpoenas anywhere, but has no power other than to report guilt if found. Nor has the senate any power other than to expel. What justice demands in such cases is that the guilty be expelled, put in prison and made to pound rock for a term at least equal to that for which he was corruptly elected to make laws. Those Illinois miscreants are fairly laughing in their sleeves.

The Power of a Moral Sense

The power there is in a public moral sense is being splendidly exemplified in the revolution that is taking place in the government of San Francisco, for, unless it be a bluff of unrivaled audacity, what is taking place amounts to a revolution. Take a look at it. In it will be found both food for thought and reason for taking courage. The power there is in a community moral sense is being vindicated before our eyes.

Here was a mayor, and a working majority of supervisors and other city officers, elected, not as pretended, to represent that element in our municipal life that toils and moils for a living, but that element that is parasitic, that lives and thrives on the excesses and follies of men and women; that element of criminality that fetches together in a common fraternity the grafter and the gambler, those who would bring justice to naught and those who would live in unbridled license.

The ideal that the members of this city government had in mind was "gay Paree," not the Paris of parks and boulevards, of public edifices having nobility of design, not the Paris of culture and refinement, of literature and art, of science and learning, but the Paris of jewelers' shops and luxurious cafes, of bedizened women and profligate men, the Paris of a reckless night life and days of disturbed dreams, the vortex of a commonwealth, yes, even of a republic. In furtherance of this design the "lid" was taken off seething vice, and a Chief of Police was selected who was expected to see nothing and hear nothing that would interfere with the city's unbridled gaiety. The story of the extension of the tenderloin, the opening of innumerable clubs, of the loosening of all that ought to have been chained and the chaining of all that ought to have been loosened, is too familiar to all to require recounting. San Francisco, for the first time since before the fire, became a wide-open town.

Then came the driving out of the prize fight gang. All honor to Governor Gillett, and no honor to Mayor McCarthy, for that! It was an act more notable for its swift and righteous morality than for its prudent and formal legality, but we can afford to let that pass. It served!

Then followed a moral awakening among the people. They had been hopeless of any good thing. The driving of the sluggers to Reno put new heart into those who stand for Right Things. The name of McCarthy became anathema in the mouths of men, the city government was made to feel the scorn of all right thinking people. That government bent before the storm. The Chief of Police, selected, as he himself declared, with the expectation that he would be blind, was forced out of office, as he complained, because he did not see. The enlarged tenderloin was ordered closed, the lid was shut down and a man was appointed Chief of Police upon whom the community can rely to be blind to no unclean thing, a man with a heart of oak and a civic morality well-nigh Puritanical. The ordinance designed for bringing back the slot machines was strangled by its own creators and cast out as unclean.

Has this our city government therefore been brought under conviction for sin? Not by any manner of means. The McCarthy of October, 1910, is the same McCarthy that in October, 1909, was promising, openly and undisguisedly promising, to make San Francisco the "Paris of America" with all the license that commonly goes with a seaport city. The supervisors who then "personally favored" a wide-open city "personally favor" such a city now, but, as they themselves confess, the decency they are manifesting is a surrender of personal preferences to the demands of a moral sense on the part of the people of San Francisco.

This the city government is better able to obey than to appreciate.

What the power of a moral purpose is to a man the strength of a public moral sense is to a city. There is no iniquity so brazen, no turpitude so shameless, as not to quail before it. What San Francisco now needs is to move up higher and demand more, for instance, the driving of all saloons out of the residence districts. If decency knew its own strength it would not be balked of its desires.

It was too much to expect that the Mayor would complete the laudable work undertaken without exposing the ears of the animal he so much resembles at least once. He must pay his respects to the administration of former Mayor Taylor by declaring that he fell heir, January 8, to intolerable conditions that principally owed their origin to a resolution of the Board of Police Commissioners passed March 21, following. This outbreak is to be accepted as indicative of the character of the real McCarthy when not restrained by the power of a public moral sense.

The Harvest of Hate

Every cause fought for develops fanaticism. Fanaticism is insanity and it often takes that form of insanity known as homicidal mania. Whoever blew up the Times office at Los Angeles was a homicidal fanatic.

No one not blinded by prejudice or passion will charge the striking unions in Los Angeles with responsibility for the atrocity, and yet no one not blinded by prejudice or passion can deny that if there had been no strike there would have been no explosion. The attempted destruction of the home of Zehandelaar, evidently by the same persons and with the same kind of explosives used at the home of General Otis, sufficiently disproves the inference that Mexican revolutionists were the perpetrators of the outrage.

Fanaticism, in the mind of the fanatic, not only removes the stigma of assassination from the taking of life but exalts it to the highest act of patriotism. Witness the hundreds of thousands buried alive or burned at the stake in defense of religion, for the extirpation of witchcraft, believing they were doing God's service. There are scores of labor unionists who would put a fly out of the window without injury who would nevertheless kill a "scab" as they would kill a dog that had attacked and torn one of their children, believing that they were conferring upon the cause of brotherhood an inestimable blessing. And they would give their own lives as readily as they would sacrifice the lives of others. It is a terrible thing, this homicidal fanaticism. It has made the world a shambles times without number.

It is the offspring of tyranny and hate. It cannot be repressed. It cannot be stamped out. Where the most repressive measures are adopted there terrorism thrives best. The blood of the martyrs is the seed, not alone of the church, but of the guild, the revolution, the "cause," whatever its nature.

Dynamite is destined to play a dangerous part in the social controversies of all countries. It is easily obtained, easily transported, hidden, placed and exploded, and it leaves few traces. Were it not that most criminals are blunderers, detection would be impossible. That twenty-one innocent lives were lost in the Times building does not argue against the atrocity being the act of labor union fanatics. They would find little difficulty in convincing themselves that whoever upheld the arch enemy of labor, by working for him, deserved to share his fate. Neither reason nor compassion places limits upon atrocities of which a homicidal fanaticism is capable.

But it cannot, must not, be that any cause can be advanced through terrorism. If concessions, denied to other methods of propaganda, were yielded to terrorism such tragedies as that of the destruction of the Los Angeles Times would become as common as railroad accidents if not as accidents by automobile. If there be a yielding to that sort of persuasion all will be lost. Its ineffectiveness must be its most convincing dissuasion. The truculent determination of General Otis to fight on as he has been fighting, blindly and relentlessly, becomes by this atrocity a redeeming virtue rather than a vice. Once concede the convincing quality of the dynamite argument, and there will, where passions have been aroused, be an end to all other tribunals for the adjusting of differences.

And yet General Otis has but reaped the harvest of the hate-crop he has been sowing for twenty years. A courageous man and a doughty fighter, he has chosen to fight the right as often as the wrong, to blister and bludgeon whoever aroused his animosities, and his animosities were as quick and as irrational as the acts of any fanatic. He has lived under the dispensation of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, and the sympathy now felt for him is that felt for a poor old man who has earned the hatred of the many and the love of the few. Of course this does not palliate the inhuman tragedy. It merely accounts for it.

What, then, is the remedy for such atrocities? Society cannot hold together if they become frequent. There is but one remedy and that is justice, justice so even-handed, so palpably fair, the deal so square that the rancor of injustice can find no lodging place in any human heart. Even then there will be an occasional Guiteau or Czolgosz! The maxim of social order must be, "nothing to terrorism, but everything to reason and right." The fault of General Otis has been that he has been no more willing to make concession to reason and to right than to terrorism, but let him stand firm now. It were an unspeakable evil to have the issue turn out as it did when the San Francisco grafters inspired and hired the use of dynamite on their behalf, for, in that case, terrorism attained its object. It drove beyond the jurisdiction of the court a most material witness against them. Did the success of that enterprise nerve the arms of those who blew up the Times building?

Promotion for Judge Coffey

Without disparagement to the many good qualities of Judge Thomas J. Lennon, an honest gentleman and a just and able judge, this paper has, after mature deliberation, reached the conclusion that Judge James V. Coffey has richly earned, and should receive, promotion to the appellate bench. The thought was for a time entertained that Judge Coffey might owe it as a further duty to the well-being of San Francisco to remain where he is to dispose of the probate business of the city and county with that integrity and steadfastness that has characterized his twenty-eight years of service on the bench; but the first district court of appeals needs strengthening. As now constituted it has not the full confidence of the public. It needs re-enforcement. It especially needs added to its personnel a man unafraid of criticism, stanch and steadfast, widely known to be strong. It is the misfortune of Judge Lemmon that he has not had opportunity to become a household personification of judicial strength. Fortune has given Judge Coffey that opportunity and he has made the most of it. His accession to that bench will strengthen it as perhaps the accession of no other man could. Our courts need the utmost that can be done for them toward reassuring the public mind regarding them and, for this reason if for no other, The California Weekly commends Judge James V. Coffey to the favorable consideration of its readers.

The Revolution in Portugal

Conditions in Spain and Portugal are similar and both have been living with a half smothered volcano under them. That recent events may be understood a few blunt truths must be stated.

The kings of both countries are peurlities and have little or no hold on the affections or imaginations of their people. They have virtually abdicated all functions of government in the interests of rather strong prime ministers. There is a profound conviction among the toiling masses that the toilers do not get a fair return for their toil and that the reasons they do not are three: That they are supporting an idle and luxurious royalty, that the Catholic orders are securing advantages that work a hardship upon the commonalty, and that special privilege underlies all things.

What is known in these two countries as anarchism is prevalent among the people. It is not anarchism as we conceive it. Rather is it a going with philosophical anarchists, although not of them, as the best method of protesting against the existing order, as, in Germany, hundreds of thousands of Germans, not Socialists, vote with the Socialists as the best available method of protesting against a social order founded on privilege. This anarchism is not in the main terroristic, but it is profoundly in earnest and inclined to revolution.

The expulsion of the Catholic orders from France caused many of them to take refuge in Spain and Portugal, where the church obtained for them valuable concessions and immunities from taxation that bear hard upon the industries of the people, both in unequal competition and in taxation, a taxation that, from one cause or another, keeps the people poor. These are the fundamental causes of the outbreak in Portugal and the unrest in Spain.

It is of interest, too, to us to know that one of the ideals most cherished by these "anarchists" is a desire for such a public school system as we have in America, and especially those features of our public school system that embrace free technical and agricultural instruction. In short, the whole movement is a part of that world movement for the rise of the common man that is shaping our "newer nationalism," our "Human Republicanism," as Hiram Johnson expresses it. Being self-restrained and Germanic in our ancestry we proceed by orderly methods. Being Latin in origin and not inured to self-restraint our Portuguese and Spanish brothers, fighting a similar battle against "the interests," disorders there result, while here nothing more dangerous occurs than a warmth in the collar. If we will but put ourselves in their places we shall have much sympathy for the ambitions and hopes of our brethren across the water, although their methods are not such as we can commend.

Passing of the Indian

Lugubrious lacerations are being indulged because the census shows that the Indian is passing from the earth. What of it? All who are born into the world must die out of it, whether white or black, red or yellow, and to fail of being born is not an injury likely to cause intensity of suffering to the person most vitally concerned, the person not born. He can stand it.

The negro in America is going the same road as the Indian, albeit a little slower. The generations born since the war are hardly maintaining their own numbers. They are dying off or fading out. If not yet absolutely, at least relatively as to the whites, the blacks in America are petering out. It may be doubted if a better solution of the color problem could be devised.

But what of the Yankee, too? By all signs and portents he is traveling the same road traveled by the Indian and the Negro. He it was who made the mold in which the typical American was cast, shaped his institutions, conceived his ideals, made his history, but, even in New England itself, the child born today is as likely to have a flannel mouth as a blue belly, to have the swart skin of Latin or Greek as the light hair or blue eyes of the Saxon.

And while the quarter of a million of Indians and the ten or twelve millions of negroes are dying out what countless millions of whites will terminate their strains from precisely the same cause—inability to withstand the press and stress of those fitter to survive. Race suicide at the top and poverty, squalor and crime at the bottom, are drawing no color lines. Even the Jew with his wonderful struggle to preserve his racial integrity approximates to Slav in Slavonia, to Arab in Arabia, to the Moor in Morocco, to the Saxon in England, to the Frank in France, to the Muscovite in Russia. Whether or not we were all of one flesh in the beginning that we shall be at the ending, at least in America, is demonstrable. What the product will be God knows, we do not.

Southern Pacific Oil Lands

The declaration of Gifford Pinchot, that the United States government should at once proceed to recover the ownership of the oil lands within the grants to the Southern Pacific Company, carried joy to many and indignation to others. The many said in their hearts, "Why, yes, recover them if they can be recovered. The Southern Pacific Company has no friends. By its conduct toward the people it has denied itself benefit of clergy."

Those not in sympathy with that view say, in their hearts, and very probably by word of mouth also: "There they go again, those anarchists! That shows that the people have no sense of justice, that they would deprive anyone whom they dislike of all rights in property or in life itself if they had the power. The Southern Pacific Company got these lands in good faith and the fact that oil has since been discovered under them should not cause title thereto to be unsettled."

Neither side has the advantage of the other. Both are voicing first impressions and not settled convictions. The first would retrieve the lands, whether or no, and the second, whether or no, would not disturb the Southern Pacific in their possession. Both are wrong.

The issue is: What did the original grant contemplate? Was it nominated in that grant that mineral lands should be excluded? The terms of the grant should be lived up to whether they work to the benefit of one side or other and emotion should have no part in the discussion for or against. Let justice be done according to law, but let the subject be looked into that justice may be done.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

With the doctrinal value of The Cross this department has no concern. That is for theologians, but as a fact in history the crucifixion moved the heart of the world. And perhaps no other feature of that incomparable tragedy has had a deeper significance through all the centuries since than the appeal to The Father to forgive, "for they know not what they do."

But was that a real good reason why that blood-hungry mob should have been forgiven? Is not knowing what one does a good excuse for doing wrong, for doing the monstrous thing? Were those Jews so easily excusable for plotting the death of The Christ? He was giving the old order a thorough shaking. They held the mistaken opinion that the shaking would work injury to humanity. Had the doctrine of culpable negligence no place in the moral philosophy of that time? It has now and needs a more rigorous application than it receives.

In reinvestigating the great financial agencies at work in Wall street Mr. Lincoln Steffens finds that the players of the game of high finance have no vision of, or concern for, the ultimate social consequences of their acts. They see chances to make money according to the rules of the game of money-making and they avail themselves of all such opportunities without stopping to consider consequences to country or to humanity. They "know not what they do." What is worse, they care not to know. It does not occur to them that they should make it their business to know. Like a man in a well, those men of Wall street have a narrow horizon which they have no innate desire to broaden. Is their offense against human society one to be lightly and inconsiderately forgiven? The Man on the cross, spear thrust in his side, spikes driven through feet and hands, brow bleeding from the pricks of the crown of thorns, he could forgive his tormentors and go out of life bearing no malice in his heart, but was it not the business of those who wrought that inhuman injury to know what they did?

The purpose is not to quarrel with the tragedy on Calvary, but to bring nearer home the doctrine of responsibility for what we do, the obligation that is upon each of us to look where we step that we may not tread upon the toes or the skirts of others, to study our philosophies of life and see where they tend.

A hunter goes into the brush, sees something, he does not know what, and, at a venture, blazes away at it. It is another hunter who falls writhing in the agony of death. Sorrow for the dead is lost in sorrow for the "poor fellow" who shot him. He knew not what he did. But why didn't he know? He had better lose all the deer in the world, going to his grave without ever having killed one of the beautiful creatures than to have fired one shot at a chance of killing a man.

A man gets drunk and, when in a drunken frenzy, commits a horrible crime. "Poor fellow! He didn't mean to. He knew not what he did. He was drunk." We all see in a case of this kind that not knowing is no excuse, that it is the business of everyone to stay sober so that he may know, that he may keep his wits about him.

But how many of us search our own hearts to know the inspiring motives that lie within, to know if those motives be worthy? How many of us prearrange our courses in life with reference to their effect upon those about us? How many give heed to know if what they want very much to do is going to be worth doing? If we do not concern ourselves to know is it because we fancy that ignorance is an abundant justification? Ignorance of the law is no excuse for law-breaking. The civil law puts us upon inquiry that we may know. The moral law cannot do less. We may be forgiven our fault, but except we have done our best to know what we do, our fault cannot be justified.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

What We Pay Our Parsons

If you have a pain below the solar plexus, for which your simple but practical old grandmother would have applied an enthusiastic mustard plaster, you send for a physician, who diagnoses the ailment as appendicitis, cuts you open and removes that internal excrescence which, as so many doctors regretfully admit, proves that Nature is but a bungling craftsman, after all. Then, if you are strictly honest, you pay him a few hundred dollars for his services, and reflect on how much he has benefited you. But suppose it is your soul that is diseased and afflicted with such pain as demands treatment, what do you do then? Why, you and a few dozens or hundreds of other men "chip in" together, hire a spiritual physician by the year, and, for an entire year's unremitting service, pay him perhaps as much as you paid the physical doctor for a single operation. This is the estimate that we set on the proportionate values of the souls and bodies of us, and we should know something about the kind of souls we carry and what they are worth. The average parson in the United States of America receives a salary of $663 a year, $55.25 a month, with prices of food, clothing and all things still ballooning! Let us fervently trust, brethren, that the treasure he lays up in Heaven will in the end compensate for genteel starvation here below. The Unitarian, whose religion is denied to be religion by the more orthodox, treats his clergyman best of all, paying him an average annual salary of $1,653, but Congregationalists and Lutherans also pay their average parsons more than a hundred dollars a month. From these figures the annual salaries shade down until they reach low and lowest water mark in the average of $121 paid by the Separate Baptists and $111 paid by the Congregational Methodists. Is it too much to say that the whole situation suggests that either our souls are of slight value or we underestimate them? In any event, may the Lord help the parsons, for man is none too willing.

Messina Still Lies in Ruins

It now is nearly two years since the city of Messina was practically annihilated by an earthquake. Very shortly after the catastrophe the question was generally asked, Will the city ever be rebuilt? and Italy replied, It undoubtedly will, and that right speedily. But, notwithstanding the assurance of the reply, twenty-two months have gone, the city yet lies in its first ruins, and practically nothing tending to its rehabilitation has been done. A correspondent of the New York Times describes its present appearance as follows: "The city, as it appears on approaching it by sea, looks just as it did after the disaster—the screen of brick and masonry, behind which there is nothing but destruction; the perilous waterfront, the clouds of dust. Pedestrians have to pick their way among the ruins, and many streets are still impassable." It must be admitted that that is not a picture of a city rebuilt or rebuilding, and there is little hope for Messina's future in it. In rows on rows of wooden huts perhaps 100,000 people exist, but these are described by the correspondent as "for the most part human vultures." Perhaps the first promises concerning Messina will be realized, but the prospect does not look good.

Small Pay for Good Work

Blessed is he who expects little, for he will get it. This is a business age in a commercial world, and he who trusts to free will offerings is likely to go hungry. In Switzerland, away up on the summit of Simplon mountain, 11,700 feet above the sea level, is a hospice maintained by the good monks of St. Augustine for the shelter and comfort of travelers. The fathers give food and lodging to all who ask it, and they ask nothing for their kind services save such sums as their guests may choose to give. It transpires that if the travelers are appreciative of this service their appreciation does not take the guise of coin to a noticeable degree. To illustrate, during a recent week the hospice was crowded throughout the entire seven days, all beds were occupied, many were compelled to sleep in the corridors, much food was eaten, the monks were overworked, and the sum total of compensation, or gratuities, found in the gift-box at the end of the week was—nine cents! It seems a pity that the good monks did not feed the souls rather than the bodies of those guests, for if they had it is evident that they would have had both an easy and inexpensive time of it. Not much of a business enterprise, it will be observed, but it is possible that the fathers will receive their pay in such unseen coin as will pass without question in a far country of which we know not.

Why the Hebrews Write Backwards

Now comes Dr. Erlenmeyer, a German sage, with a unique explanation of why the Hebrews—and, for that matter, all Semitic peoples—write from right to left on the page, instead of from left to right, as most other peoples do. The explanation is simple, very simple, provided the postulate on which it is based is within the facts. Briefly, the doctor maintains that all of the ancient Hebrews were left-handed, and hence it was as natural for them to write from right to left as it is for right-handed people to write from left to right. He founds his theory of the universal Hebraic left-handedness on a number of passages in the Talmud in which special instructions are given in order to assure the use of certain phylacteries with the right hand. Also, various passages in the Old Testament are pointed out as evidence to the same effect; such a one, for example, as Genesis records when it tells how Jacob laid his left hand on the head of Joseph's son to bless him. The doctor's theory is interesting, but the skeptically-inclined might hold that the proofs he offers to support it are a trifle tenuous.

Increasing Millions for Pensions

It requires a long, long time to pay the fiddler who furnishes the music for the awful dance of war. It is, too, a double price that he asks: first, that which is written in blood, wounds and human agony; second, that which is expressed in dollars. Consider, for a moment, the pension phase of this second price only. In 1865, just after the close of the civil war, there were 85,986 pensioners in the United States. Forty-four years later, or in 1909, the number of such pensioners had increased to 946,194. The original number had multiplied itself by more than eleven, an increase of over 1,000 per cent, which is not slow progress for 44 years. A portion of the pensioners are an inheritance from the Spanish-American war, but the proportion is slight. But the foregoing figures fail to tell the worst of the story. In 1865 the total paid for pensions was $8,525,153.11; for the fiscal year 1908-09 the total was $161,973,703.77. That is, the amount paid out had multiplied itself by nineteen, an increase of 1,800 per cent. The average amount paid to each pensioner increased 80 per cent in the 44 years. At present each average head of a family of five is paying nine dollars annually for pensions. The American people are not likely to begrudge pensions to the defenders of their country, but they cannot well fail to realize, in view of such facts, that the price of war is high and is a long time in being paid.

A Classification of Americans

The Circle magazine has classified the people of the United States to its own satisfaction, having first established a test to determine who are, and who are not, of pure American lineage. It does so about as follows: In the first place, as the original white comers to this country were English, with side strains of Scotch, Irish, Dutch, French and Scandinavian, the Circle decides that an American of today of unmixed blood must be of one of these strains and of an unbroken descent from before the revolutionary war. This, it will be granted, is a sufficiently stringent test, and, having laid it down, the Circle proceeds to classify us, as follows: Natives of unmixed descent, 1/10; negroes, 1/10; natives of foreign parentage, 1/10; natives of naturalized parentage, 6/10; aliens, 1/10. So it appears that in an average party of ten only one man, or woman, would be the real American article; the rest would be more or less distant approaches to it. Still, in one respect the classification is a relief: We were beginning to fear that most Americans might be Southern Europeans, and it appears probable that such is not the case.

In the Matter of Red Tape, Again

Speaking of official red tape, as wound and unwound in Germany—which this department did last week—a recent instance of it perhaps might be considered too good to be passed without mention. A certain Dr. Koelpin, who was a professor in the University of Bonn, was killed in a railway accident last December. Now the provincial authorities have sent a bill to the widow in which two dollars is demanded as compensation for cleaning the blood stains from the railway premises where the accident took place. At the same time they informed Frau Koelpin that if she did not pay she would be officially proceeded against. The story may sound too improbable to be true, but it is a part of official German records. When it comes to red tape—blood-red tape, one might say—Germany may be regarded as both an example and a warning unto the civilized world.

I thank God I offered my candy to Mother before taking any myself. I thank God I offered my candy to Little Brother before taking any myself. And I thank God there was some left."—Lippincott's.

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

OF "PURPOSE" IN LITERATURE

What is the mighty change that came over the spirit and tone of English literature after the Elizabethan bards and dramatists lay silent in their graves? No reader of our golden books has failed to notice the difference in style and thought and music that separates our modern writings from the old.

The writer asks the question that he may give his idea of the answer. Chaucer, Shakespeare, Marlowe, Beaumont, Fletcher, Jonson—these great writers had no thought in writing but to give beautiful expression to noble ideas and grand emotions. They wrote to please—to please themselves and to please the acute and eager taste of a world newborn to intellectual joys. To see the world of men and women, of glowing color and pulsating life, of unfeigned laughter and deep tragedy, to live and feel and then to write from the heart of these sights and emotions and experiences, these were the sole aims of them.

And what did they produce? The greatest body of literature produced by any age, the sweetest songs, the most authentic dramas, the most human, soul-searching analyses of life. Why? Because, we think, they wrote of that only which a man may fully know, his own reactions to the stress of life, its beauties, sorrows, joys, disappointments, hopes. They clothed these experiences in human forms and the result was dramas, as infinite in variety of mood and characters as the soul of a full-blooded man is infinite in variety. They clothed these emotions in lyric verse, and wrote sonnets that strike the heart of things today as intimately as they did three hundred years ago.

Look, on the contrary, at the modern point of view of authorship. With the growth of Puritanism in England, the souls of her writers were troubled. Duty became the god of the world, conscience the omnipresent guide of the soul. The moral element in life was magnified until it became the ultimate interest of life. Literature reflected this national experience. No longer did our authors ask, Is it beautiful, or, Is it true, but, Is it right? Literature, from being a beautiful art, became a weapon of morality. Tracts succeeded sonnets. Satire succeeded drama.

This moral impulse in literature has persisted to this day in English literature and it has spread abroad to other literatures. Take the Victorian novelists: George Eliot was a preacher hiding behind a novelist's skirts; Thackeray satirized the immoralities—in the broadest sense of the word—of society; Dickens cried out passionately against the wrongs inflicted on the poor; Meredith berated the sentimentality that, he believed, damned the prevailing social order. All these writers had a moral purpose as vigorous as their literary instinct was strong. Carlyle thundered against tyranny; Tennyson pleaded sweetly for a reconciliation of science and religion and the surcease of war.

Spreading abroad, the moral idea took firm hold. Hugo rained the volcanic lava of his excoriating genius upon the economic wrongs that produce the social evil and the injustices of law; Tolstoy forsook art for propaganda; Ibsen applied the methods of the surgical operating room to literature in the cause of moral disinfection of society.

Coming to our own time and country, what do we find? Plays whose motive is the social evil, corrupt politics. Novels with the same motives. And what is the result? Sordid pictures of grewsome conditions, gloomy outlines of sadly hopeless society, exposures of social festers, a display of the excrement of society, an unbelievable stench, an intolerable fog. Gone is the sweet reasonableness of the old dramatists and poets, gone is the fair perspective of their view of life, its broad foundation of common sense reinforced by hope. Our modern literature has done much as the microscope has done, it has magnified the germs of evils that healthy-bodied people easily overcome until they look like huge and menacing monsters, capable of world-wide destruction. If literature be a fair interpretation of life, and if modern literature be good literature, the world is a worthless hell and the sooner we have done with it the better.

We think better of the world. We say it, though it make us think worse of our writers. Frankly, we think they do not know their business, in its greater aspects. We think that literature has been betrayed into the hands of little men who see the big world with nearsighted eyes, little men who, to cure great evils, have made too much of its injustices and too little of its beauties, its recompenses, its glories and its joys. They have shared the mania of the age, to heal society and reform their neighbors ere they know and heal themselves.

Is it any wonder that, as a relief from this debauch of murky literature, our age should be accursed with the most marvelous array of so-called "light literature," the most inane and futile mass of trash, slang, foam, sentiment, and sickly-sweet romance that ever made rubbish of fair white paper or appalled the hearts of discerning readers while it offends both their intelligence and their taste? From one excess we fly to another, as banal and absurd.

These things are not literature, nor even of it. Wrongs there are in life: use them. Sentiment there is in life: use it. Slang is a part of the growth of language: use it. But preserve a balance, a sense of proportion. For every victim of wrong, nature provides solace and recompense in her own peculiar way. Suffering produces its own alleviating anesthetic. Some joy illumines every life. There is glory as well as gloom; there is health as well as sickness; there is sweetness as well as bitterness in the world. God give us a deliverance from the propagandists abroad in novelists' clothing, from the preachers in the theatre, from the moralists in verse. Give us again a race that hath music in its soul, that sees the color and light of life, that penetrates the human heart, that writes to express the life of humanity and not to adorn a pamphleteering tract. God give us an end to "realism," "psychology," "problem" plays and novels, and the rest of the unspeakable barnacles that cluster on the keel of our ship of song. Give us again great minds, great hearts, eyes that see and ears that hear beyond the murky area and the clattering wheels. Another Shakespeare is long overdue. Hear our devout and passionate prayer.

CALIFORNIAN POET'S CORNER

At Berkeley

These lines by Miss Irene Hardy are the tribute of a pupil and friend to Prof. Edward Rowland Sill, so much loved as poet and teacher.

This place will love one poet first and best,
Whoever comes hereafter. Not a stone
That lies along the hillward path alone
Where he has trod, but there his eye would rest

As on a friend, should he return in quest Through haunts remembered; nothing he has known

And praised but still would choose him as its own
Interpreter and best beloved guest.

Some souls there were who thought the bramble vine

That twitched his sleeve to offer fruit or flower

Had more than blessedness enough; while they

Found no good words to speak their debt or shrine

Their love in; some recorded the one hour
They heard his voice as life's own natal
day.

Wise hearts have conned his wisdom, line on line,

And fools have left their thrones and learned to pray;

And those who loved him most love most his way

Of still withdrawal—love, and make no sign.

"THE BLUE BIRD"

The following account of "The Blue Bird," by Maurice Maeterlinck, was given by the New York Sun the day preceding its first American production at the New Theatre, New York:

The New Theatre will open its second season tomorrow evening with Maurice Maeterlinck's "The Blue Bird," a "fairy play about children for grownups." The keynote is found in the expression "the blue bird for happiness."

The presentation will be made in two parts and ten scenes by a specially recruited company, and the drama will be repeated every week-day afternoon until the regular repertoire organization begins its engagement on November 7. The drama has been given abroad, but has never been seen in America. Its success lay in its philosophy, for while the play delights the young its deeper meaning appeals to adults. In his philosophy the Belgian poet shows that although happiness, as typified by the blue bird of Lorraine folklore, may be captured, it cannot be retained for all time by those fortunate enough to secure it. Throughout the play will run incidental music drawn largely from the works of Debussy, and dances called for by the action will be executed.

These numbers have been arranged by Miss Caroline Crawford of the faculty of Columbia University and will include the dances of the hours, mist maidens, perfumes, dews, will o' the wisps, loaves of bread, fire, water and glow worms. The story of the play follows: Tytyl and Mytyl, the son and daughter of a poor woodchopper, are tucked into their trundle beds on Christmas eve to await a morrow which Santa Claus will not bless. After the parents retire the children go to the window and are watching the holiday festivities in their rich neighbor's home when Fairy Berylune, a witchlike old woman, enters and demands that the children provide her with "grass that sings" or a "bird that is blue." She is particularly anxious to obtain the latter, as its capture will bring happiness to mankind and health to a sickly small girl of her acquaintance. Tytyl and Mytyl express their willingness to hunt for the bird, and the fairy sets upon the head of Tytyl a magic cap, in the center of which is a wonderful diamond. With the turning of this diamond the souls of Fire, Water, Milk, Bread, the Cat, the Dog, and even the trees, come forth and speak; the Past and Future unfold themselves and many wonderful and entrancing transformations take place. Still they have caught and retained no blue bird, and the children return through the Christmas tree forest to the cottage to find that it is very much as it was before Fairy Berylune gave them the wonderful diamond, and tired and sleepy they nestle in their trundle beds. In the morning when a neighbor, who very much resembles the fairy, comes and begs for a blue bird that her child may be made well, Tytyl and Mytyl are very much astonished to find that their turtledove in a cage by the window is blue, and has been all the time. They willingly give it, but although the child recovers the bird thereafter escapes. Maeterlinck is too good a philosopher to allow men to retain happiness after obtaining it.

The cast includes Ethel Brandon, Louise Closser Hale, Jacob Wendell, Jr., Margaret Wycherly, Eleanor Moretti, Gladys Hulette, Irene Brown, Robert E. Homans, Reginald Barlow and Gwendolyn Valentine.

CARLYLE AND HUXLEY

Carlyle hated Darwinism, which he described as the "gorilla damnification of humanity." Leonard Huxley, in his life of his father, recalls an incident that happened shortly before Carlyle's death. "My father," he writes, "saw him walking slowly and alone down the opposite side of the street and, touched by his solitary appearance, crossed over and spoke to him. The old man looked at him, and merely remarking, 'You're Huxley, aren't you—the man that says we are all descendants from the monkeys?' went on his way."

JUDGE JAMES V. COFFEY

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

Say "probate court" to anybody in San Francisco who ever inherited any property, and the same picture will instantly flash to the mind of that person as appears to the mind of every other. That picture is of a little figure of a man with rosy cheeks and white hair, who sits on the bench all day long, busily writing while attorneys drone and wrangle and pose and question, the judge apparently oblivious and absorbed in his writing until suddenly he raises his head, the shrewd eyes twinkle and the rosy cheeks expand into a smile and a crackling witticism issues from his lips, at once thrusting home to the point in issue at the moment and spreading a grin of appreciation all around the bar and courtroom.

This man on the bench is Judge James V. Coffey. He has sat there for twenty-eight years, passing upon estates in probate. The estates that he has settled in that time amount in value to more than $500,000,000. The title to practically every parcel of real estate in the city and county of San Francisco depends upon a decision rendered by Judge Coffey at one time or another. Judge Coffey's probate decisions make five volumes; they are known all over the civilized world, and they are quoted as authority in every court of America.

We have tried to resist it, but in vain; the pun is inevitable because it is good—San Francisco has the Coffey habit. Apparently it is incurable. Judge Coffey was elected to fill out an unexpired term on the superior court bench of San Francisco in 1882; he was elected to a full term in 1883, and he has been re-elected ever since as regularly as the elections came around. He was first elected as a Democrat. In 1906 he was nominated by all the parties—Democratic, Republican, Union Labor and Independence League—and elected unanimously. And never since he first mounted the bench has he done any sort of politics, sought any nomination or done any campaigning to attain election, not even to having a card printed or asking any man to vote for him.

Why, then, has he been kept continuously in his office for twenty-eight years? The answer is as much a compliment to the voters of San Francisco as it is to Judge Coffey. It is because here is a judge who is honest, just, able and industrious. And everybody knows it and the public has had intelligence enough to appreciate it.

The four adjectives used above deserve to be amplified in Judge Coffey's case. To his integrity every man who knows him at all pays tribute. The probate court offers to a judge any number of chances to be swayed by self-interest, political influence, friendship and the like. Judge Coffey has heeded none of these. Of the $500,000,000 that have passed through his court, every heir got every cent that the administration of the law made it possible for him to receive. As the entire bar of San Francisco will bear witness, he has held down the attorney's fees to a just but moderate level. He has always kept in mind the principle that the probate law is designed to transmit the testator's net estate to his heirs as expeditiously and economically as possible, consonant with security of title.

Of his fairness, no one ever raised a question. He is a just judge, as even his opponents freely admit. His ability is attested by the fact that he has hardly ever been reversed on appeal, though all the great will contests have been decided by him; by the testimony of the bar, and by the high regard in which his decisions are held in other states.

His industry is almost unbelievable. The writing that he does on the bench is really a complete record of the case, in longhand—notes so copious and exact as to be the wonder of the bar. Those who know his habits say that for twenty-five years he has risen at seven and worked without cessation until one or two the next morning, every day, year in and year out. His lunch hour is ten minutes long. He has found the truth that the law is a jealous mistress, for he has never married. The law occupies all his time.

That last statement is essentially true, but should be modified to this extent: Judge Coffey has found time in his life to be an omnivorous reader; his knowledge of general literature, of history and of economics is amazing. And it is not merely bookish knowledge, but an equipment for life, informing and coloring the whole trend of his thoughts. And he has found time also to be a very human person. His sense of humor is very keen, it lights the course of his life constantly, and has earned him a wide reputation for ready and penetrating wit. Since 1893 he has been president of the California Historical Society.

Judge Coffey was born in New York City, Dec. 14, 1846, and received his early education in Bridgeport, Conn. Then for a number of years he was employed in a law office in New York. Coming west in 1862, he located in Virginia City, Nevada, where he was a clerk in the famous firm of Carson & White. He also served in the district attorney's office for some time. In 1867 he came to San Francisco.

JUDGE JAMES V. COFFEY

where he was employed for two years in the office of Casserly & Barnes. During all these years in law offices he was reading law, and in 1869 he was admitted to practice by the Supreme Court of California.

Now come several important phases of his life that are not generally known to the younger generations in California. During the first years of his practice, Judge Coffey was also a leading editorial writer on the old San Francisco Examiner. His editorials were remarkable for their basis of profound study and for their brilliantly forceful English. They exercised a great influence in molding public sentiment in those days. In the six years of his connection with the Examiner, Judge Coffey made many valiant fights for public rights and against political corruption and corporation domination.

At this time he was also active in politics as a Democrat. In 1875 he was elected to the assembly of the state legislature and was chosen chairman of the San Francisco delegation. In this position he passed on practically all the legislation introduced and became a great power in state affairs. It is now almost forgotten that Judge Coffey procured the passage of the first law ever enacted in California that provided for civil service in public employment, the present civil service regulation of the police and fire departments in this state being due to his work. He was also the author of the famous gas bill which gave the Board of Supervisors the right to regulate gas rates and to compel the maintenance of the quality of gas. At that time gas cost consumers $3.75 a thousand feet, and there was no legal regulation. The present relatively low gas rate—$1 a thousand—and relatively high quality are due directly to Judge Coffey's work. And the principle of state regulation, now generally applied to public service corporations, was introduced into California law by Judge Coffey, and from his bill incorporated almost verbatim into the present state constitution.

He served another term in the legislature—1877-79. There he made a brilliant reputation as a public speaker and public-spirited legislator. A speech delivered by him in 1878 in the legislature reads as if it might have been delivered yesterday by Hiram Johnson in his campaign for the reform of state politics. It is worth while to quote the first paragraphs:

"The rapidly increasing power and influence of corporations has for years been a subject of solicitude to the thoughtful.

"Particularly have those great lines of railroad, formed by consolidation or combination excited the apprehensions of the patriot, who looks to a provision of defense for the liberties and purity of governments in the future.

"The experience of the country has impressed the lesson that competition may be robbed of its prerogative, while monopoly—the evil genius of trade—seizes hold of the people and plunders their pockets.

"The railroad era in this country has hardly dawned. We see nothing of enterprise in this department in comparison with what we shall see. And now in the infancy of this great system let the people look to it that they are not mastered or corrupted by its ambitious power.

"Already it has conspired to control the legislature and the courts, and even congress has bowed to its mandates; while the dictation of a President of the United States is in no wise out of the range of its possibilities. Such a power, having at its command such vast influences for controlling the action of men, and such extended abilities for personal purchase and legislative corruption, rises before our eyes this day as the overtowering danger of the times. By the simple process of fixing the rates of travel and transportation a whole state and people, out of whose sweat and toil these great lines were constructed, may be made hewers of wood and drawers of water for distant wealthy centers, while courts and legislatures may be so manipulated as to perpetuate the wrong."

In 1879, Judge Coffey was the chairman of the Democratic county convention of San Francisco county. In that same year he was nominated by the unanimous vote of the Democratic state convention for attorney-general, but declined the nomination. In 1882 he mounted the bench, where he has ever since remained.

From that moment he put politics behind him. This does not mean, however, that he became a recluse, dead to the spirit of the time. Quite the reverse. He has kept abreast of the day. Time after time his advice to the legislature has resulted in the reform of existing laws. His public addresses and writings have been an inspiration to progress. For instance, a few weeks ago he wrote an article for the Sacramento Bee, on "Probate Proceedings and Reform," from which a few quotations will show him keenly alive to the present and wise in his suggestions. For example:

"The law, however, in its spirit is beneficent, and not vindictive. The Author of the law, while an Exponent of justice, is an Exemplar of mercy, and designs rectification and not revenge. So we are reminded of our infirmities that we may seek a remedy. This simply suggests that as one day follows another, we should endeavor to profit by our experience. We cannot stand still. Stagnation is extinction."

The black letters are ours. The statement appeals to us as beautifully wise and to the point of the times. Again:

"Legislation is a progressive science, and no part of our scheme of government is or should be exempt or immune from the universal law of progress."

She Never Bothers Mommer

(The following has all the swing and verve of a popular song. All it needs is some notes and bars—do not misunderstand the type of bar to which reference is made—judiciously selected from the soul-stirring ballads of the day.)

It was in an Eastern valley where the gentlest zephyrs come
That first I kissed my Laura Lee, and that was going some.
Her eyes were blue, her hair was gold as sun-sets of the West—
When first we met 'twas raven, but peroxide did the rest.
I held her little hand in mine, and this to her I said:
"My perfect, faultless angel, won't you tell me when we'll wed?"
"Not perfect," then she did reply, "my toes I often stub,
But I never bothers mommer when she rastles with the tub."

Chorus:

When her ma is at the tub
She always lets her scrub,
For she says she loves the rhythm of the garments as they rub,
And her dainty hands are white
As the fingers of a sprite,
So she never bothers mommer when she rastles with a tub.

Since then the years have drifted by, and she and me are wed;
Her hair that once was gold or black is now of gray instead,
And we have a daughter charming as her mother used to be,
And my gas bills climb up higher when Augustus visits she.
She can play on the piannah till the ghost of Vogner squirms;
She's authority on culchah and the latest styles of germs,
And Augustus says she's perfect and he'd like to be her hub,
But she never bothers mommer when she rastles with the tub.

Chorus:

When her ma is at the tub
Tinkle, tinkle clashy-dub!
'Tis my Mabyllannyc playing for her dear prospective hub,
And the sparkle of her ring
'Gainst the keys is quite the thing,
So she never bothers mommer when she rastles with a tub.

Tackled Too Big a Job

"You knew Blinkum, the inventor, did you not?"

"Well, he's dead."
"What was the matter?"

The Ants on the Heap

I suppose, Horatio, that the ants on their heap vary in temperament and characteristics much as we humans do. There are those that take themselves very seriously, and wonder how Creation got along before they arrived, and there are others that view themselves with such levity that they cannot escape an impression that Creation might have wobbled along in some way even if they had been delayed.

Watch the serious chap. He drags the wing of a beetle over smooth ground and rough. With herculean efforts he carries the wing as far as an obstacle which he vainly essays to surmount, never once thinking that he might go around the obstacle. At last he gives it up, drags the wing back where he found it, drops it, wipes his hands and mops his perspiring brow, and says to himself, "Gee! What would Creation have done if I had not been here to attend to this job this morning?" The trivial-minded ant does a similar thing, but he views it all as a joke, and himself as not improbably the best part of the joke.

Whether or not ants are thus divided, Horatio, you may safely bet your nice, new automobile that men are. There are those of us who view ourselves seriously—oh, so seriously! We have been placed here, we are certain, to discover and elucidate the Wherefore of the Why and the Whichness of the What. To be sure, we never do discover and elucidate, but we are none the less confident that that is the beetle's wing which we have been providentially delegated to carry to the boneyard. So, solemnly and profoundly, we struggle with it, until at last we leave it precisely where we found it, and move on to that unseen realm where, perchance, we at last shall comprehend the Wherefore of the Why, the Eternal Mystery.

But we who are trivial, we need not consider ourselves wholly a joke in order to realize that we are very small, so small that perhaps the ants on their heap do not weigh much less in the infinite scale of Creation than do we in our earth-bound ways. Be serious if you please, but you are an extremely tiny unit in the immeasurable sum total.

A Gentlemen's Receipt

A Philadelphian whose father has been in the banking business says there is no reason why a gentleman should not dress well on $6,000 a year.—As reported.

Here's the receipt,
If you would be
A gentleman
Of some degree;
Don't mind the mob,
Nor heed its tricks,
But dress yourself
On thousands six.

The hoi polloi,
As Our Set know,
Is rude and vul—
Gar, crude and low;
Upon the proof
Attention fix:
They do not dress
On thousands six.

But we, whose pas
The plunks have caught
Can dress like gen—Tlemen had ought,
And with the mob
We do not mix—
They haven't got
The thousands six.

Gentle Woman's Gentleness

It is with unfeigned delight that I pay my tribute to woman's gentleness, to the spiritual placidity which expresses itself in her every action, to the shrinking modesty which causes her to hide her light under a bushel hat, to the—

I was interrupted when I had gotten that far with my little panegyric, and I made the almost fatal mistake of going to a store for something that I needed. Too late I discovered that I had entered the store on a bargain day. I strove to escape, but unleashed femininity, sweeping on like a tidal wave, rushed me toward the vortex of the trouble. Alas! my efforts were in vain. My throat was sawed by the edges of hats, the owners of which were somewhere in the distance; hatpins stabbed my face; sweeping skirts and short skirts, liberal skirts and hobble skirts, surrounded and engulfed me. Protesting and madly striving to escape, on and on I was swept.

The doctor says that my two broken ribs, my dislocated arm and wrenched shoulder will recover, and that I will be all right after a time—unless there are internal injuries, of which he cannot be sure at present. In the meantime gentle women are tenderly caring for me in their gentle way, and I entertain no doubt that eventually I will recuperate.

But, as I lie here, I am filled with poignant anguish by the thought that I am not well enough to complete my tribute to woman's gentleness, modesty and placidity. I really entertain no doubt that it would have been as beautiful as deserved, and it seems a pity that it could not have been finished before misfortune overtook me.

His Voice Puts the Rest to Shame

He sometimes drives an auto,
But he does not use the horn,
And if he were an engineer
The whistle he would scorn;
He would not use the megaphone
That aural anguish breeds.
He is yell-leader of his class—
His voice is all he needs.

"On the contrary, he despises it."
"Lacks the poetical temperament, I suppose?"

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Direct Primaries In New York State

When this department was closed last week Theodore Roosevelt had won a significant victory in the Empire state, and the Democrats were just getting together at Rochester to take advantage of any situation that the Republicans might have created. They afterward nominated John A. Dix for governor and put up a full state ticket. With the personnel of either ticket we in California have little to do. The Democratic party "viewed with alarm" or "emphatically condemned" most that was in the platform of the Republicans, but declared unequivocally for direct primaries in that state. They rather outstripped the Republicans in that particular for the Republican platform committed the state and party to direct primaries, absolutely, only so far as the legislature and the control of the party machinery are concerned, leaving it to the legislators whom the people select, and to the party managers whom they elect to carry the primary idea as far as they think best. This makes it fairly evident that there will be an advance toward direct primaries in New York. The world moves and New York is keeping up with the procession.

Roosevelt Or Murphy

That the Democratic convention in New York was controlled by Tammany and bossed by Charles F. Murphy was frankly admitted, and yet not without much consultation and bargain-counter huckstering with Democrats up state and down state. The retort is, what did Murphy do in the Democratic convention that Roosevelt did not do in the Republican? On the face of it honors are even. Under the surface the difference was broad and deep. Murphy's campaign was based on patronage and a division of the spoils. Roosevelt's campaign was inspired by a vital principle and was based on a moral enthusiasm for the public good. Both personalities dominated, that of Murphy because he had back of him Tammany, the most perfect organization of political spoilsmen the world has ever known; that of Roosevelt because he had back of him the most potent moral enthusiasm among the people in recent times. Roosevelt led, Murphy drove. Few men will vote the Democratic ticket because of hearts burning for the common welfare. Few men will vote the Republican ticket whose hearts do not so burn. The issue will transcend party lines and we shall witness a battle royal betwixt the power of a political machine, re-enforced by unlimited millions, and the power of a great moral enthusiasm re-enforced by the most potent personality of our time. That fight will repay watching.

What If Roosevelt Should Fail To Win?

Many are saying that if Roosevelt fails of electing the Republican ticket in New York it will be the last of him. The spell will have been broken, the charm spoiled and he will be done for. Yes? Was that the wisdom that Robert Bruce learned of the spider? Was that the lesson that Grant learned in the Wilderness. If this leader of the newer nationalism should go up against the most perfect political organization in human history, re-enforced by the countless millions of Wall street and the inertia of the common man, whose battle he is fighting, and fail for once must he fail for always? Victory is important, but not all important. Roosevelt cannot be disposed of by defeating him nor yet by killing him. If he is defeated it will be only to "up and at 'em" again. If he is killed his soul will go marching on animating American manhood to higher and nobler things generation after generation. There is no estimating the power of a moral enthusiasm. But he stands a fighting chance to win. As intimated last week as probable, the platform was evidently dictated by the Taft interest as a condition precedent to re-enforcement by the administration influence. It was a hard bargain to drive and may make victory harder to achieve than it ought to be; but it was probably necessary to the winning of the first battle and to prevent a rupture between the former president and the present. It was not what the platform said that was untrue. It was what it left unsaid that made it only half true. That which was left unsaid in the platform will be said plainly enough from the platform and the handicap is not likely to prove fatal. Out of the conflict are likely to be evolved the issues of 1912.

We Have Had One Free Legislature

As The Watchman gave warning last week, the Governor and his advisors attempted to run a bluff on the legislature and so prevent its doing anything to amendment number one, except to supply the missing words, "the year ending," and then go home. The bluff nearly worked. A select committee of lawyers reported on Monday a resolution affirming that the legislature had no power to do otherwise than to obey the governor to the letter and the resolution was adopted by both houses. But the judiciary committee of the assembly rested uneasily that night. The chains galled it. It got together early Tuesday morning, raised the standard of revolt, declared that the legislature had full power to amend that amendment to its heart's content and the whole assembly rallied around the standard. The senate followed the assembly's example and at last California had a free and untrammelled legislature. There was only this one iron in the fire. No member had any other bills that anybody could hold up or that the governor could refuse to sign, and it seemed so good to be free that the legislature made the most of its opportunity. After the "fall of the bastille" the Governor and the lawyers, who laid men with burdens, laughed it off, admitted that it was a eard or cob bastille at best, that the legislators were good fellows and it was all right anyhow. And then they went at the amendment hammer and tongs.

Assemblyman Preston Led a Winning Fight

Assemblyman John W. Preston of Ukiah, a Democrat by inheritance, but an insurgent Republican by instinct and inclination, and a member who made, according to Hichborn's test, a perfectly clean record during the regular session of 1909, and can be counted on to so continue, led the fight for freedom and won it. It was a go-as-you-please contest with no partyism in it. What was done was mainly to restore the one per cent rate of taxing banks, that was in the amendment as submitted to the legislature by the tax commission, and to restore also the two-thirds instead of the three-fourths vote necessary to change the rate of taxation in any instance. The second issue is debateable, the first hardly. What the people have ordained by amending their organic law is not lightly to be changed by a legislature, and the tax commission originally intended that the rates should be changed only by another constitutional amendment. Of course changes may go up or down. The corporations will wish to change downward and it will be easier for them to get a two-thirds vote than a three-fourths, but, per contra, the corporations will resist changes upward, and it will be harder for them to secure a one-third than a one-fourth vote to prevent an upward change. So the issue is not far from being as broad as long, with the weight of reasonableness inclining toward the two-thirds rule. The amendment to re-imburse, until 1918, out of the common fund, all counties that suffer loss by not taxing railroads was adopted to help the amendment through before the people. Doubtless some concession should be made. Doubtless that was too much of a concession to make, but the objection should not prove fatal to the amendment.

First Attention Ever Received

The consideration given amendment number one by the legislature at the extra session just closed was the first that the legislature, as such, has ever really given to that amendment. For six years the subject has been left in the hands either of the taxation commission or the legislative committees having the subject in charge. The rest of the legislators have gone about the business that was nearer home. The corporations worked upon the committees and brought so much pressure to bear upon them that injurious concessions were made, especially to the banks. The banks, having paid so little tax in the past, naturally feel outraged at a proposal to make them pay on a parity with other forms of property. The amendment, if it goes into effect as it is, will add about a half million a year to the taxation upon the banks of California. It will leave the savings banks a shade better off than they are now, somewhat overtaxed, but it will bring the commercial and national banks to a parity with them and with other forms of taxation. This is the belief of those who have given the subject careful study. Certainly no one wishes to work a hardship upon the banking interests, but the spirit of our time requires a square deal from all as well as toward all and special privileges and exemptions to none. Some fear that the antagonism of the banks to the amendment as it stands will work against its adoption, but, on the other hand, it is almost certain that the special concession to the banks would, after the discussion on the floor of assembly and senate, have turned the public against adopting it until made right. It has been strengthened with the people though weakened with the banks by the change effected.

Mr. Kent's Campaign

Mr. William Kent has set out upon his campaign of the second district for election to congress. On the eve of starting he has taken his constituents into his confidence and told them just what they may expect him to do if elected. In another column will be found his "Statement to Voters." It is characteristic of the man, for he is one of the frankest and sincerest of men. His mind is clear and his conscience not less so; and yet he is no "silk-stocking." He can be diplomatic when necessity requires it of him. He can be tactful where there is need that he shall be. He is capable of making a sneak on his quarry, if that be the way to get it, rather than stalk it in the open and so lose it altogether, but he is not a man to sacrifice any essential principle to a time-serving policy and he is thoroughly unafraid. He will join forces with the supporters of other good measures in order to gain friends for the support of his own, but he will not log-roll with the supporters of bad measures to gain support for his own. He is not that kind of a man. Voters in the second district will be interested to know that Francis J. Heney will campaign with Mr. Kent through at least a portion of his district. They will be treated to some very straight talk. There will be something to warm the hearts and arouse the enthusiasms of all who hear them. That Mr. Kent's campaign will terminate successfully no one can doubt. The important thing is that he shall come to know his district and that his district shall know him as thoroughly. That they will get along famously together is inevitable.

As It Looks To the Man on the Mountain Up in the mountains of Madera county, where men live apart and wrestle with big trees and rocky lands to make their livings, a farmer who thinks for himself, as most of them do, was heard this week to say: "This precinct usually casts about 50 Republican and 100 Democratic votes, for a lot of us came from Arkansas and never voted any ticket but the Democratic. Four years ago twenty of our Republicans voted for Bell, there was nothing else for them to do, you see. This time Johnson will get the full Republican vote and anyhow twenty of the Democrats will vote for him, too. They have never seen Johnson, but they have come to believe in him and, you know, Johnson can get bigger reform results than Bell can the way things are in this state, for the legislature can't help being Republican. I wouldn't be surprised if forty Democrats in our precinct voted for Johnson for this reason." There is no reason in the nature of things why sentiment in that particular community should differ from sentiment in other communities throughout the state. However the cities may go, the interior of the state will go overwhelmingly for Johnson. In the cities there is an element that loves not Bell, but hates Johnson heartily for the aggressive campaign he has made. It is not quite just to Bell to say that the defeat of Johnson would be a Southern Pacific victory. The most the Southern Pacific would gain would be a deadlock between a Democratic governor and a Republican legislature, but it would be mighty satisfying all the same to Herrin and Herrinism and it would be a severe blow to progressive Republicanism the country over. Therefore the defeat of Johnson must not happen. Even the Democrats of California cannot afford to have it happen.

Lieutenant Governorship Is the Strategic Point While the friends of Hiram Johnson should keep their powder dry and help on his campaign on the theory that nothing must be left to chance, nevertheless his chances of election seem to be as good as a sure thing. But that is not true with A. J. Wallace. The lieutenant governor is of strategic value to the interests. The interests of the interests would be subserved by having a Democratic governor and a Republican legislature, but there is no possibility of having the legislature other than Republican. If every Democratic candidate having the ghost of a show were elected the legislature would still be Republican, and the chance of electing a Democratic governor is exceedingly small. Therefore the only card left for the allied "interests" to play is in "balling up" the legislature by securing the presiding officers of the two houses. If they can elect a Democrat to preside over a Republican legislature, a Democrat who will be "reasonable," they will have gained a point of great strategic value, and there are reasons for fearing that Timothy Spellacy is such a man. Down under the surface there is a strong current setting toward Spellacy and it owes its origin to the same sort of influence that secured senatorial endorsement from so many districts for Spalding, a man wholly unknown to California and whose fitness for the senatorial office is not known to a hundred voters in the state. A. J. Wallace is no gladhander, but he is true all the way through and it stands all good citizens in hand to rally to his support. To suffer him to fail of being elected would be mighty bad politics.

Johnson's Human Republicanism That Hiram Johnson is no politician every politician knows. He is too plain spoken. On the contrary Mr. Bell contrives with admirable tact to hold to his position of four years ago without driving away from him any who might be inclined to come to him through not being able to keep step with Mr. Johnson. But, to offset this tactful advantage of Mr. Bell's, Mr. Johnson's utterances are wonderfully stirring. Here is a sample that is worth pondering:

"It is human republicanism that I am preaching in the State of California now. It is a republicanism that demands that the government shall control the interests and not the interests control the government. It is a republicanism that exalts the human being above the mere dollar. It is a republicanism that demands, in fact, a government of the people.

"Rather than be swerved one bit from the line upon which I began this fight six months ago I'd lose the governorship of the State of California and every vote in San Diego county. I began this battle with the one great end in view of kicking out of the government of the state William F. Herrin and the Southern Pacific railroad and in the fulfillment of that end there shall be neither vacillation, hesitation, concession nor compromise.

"The country is for the man, who is now speaking to you because it knows he is going to do just exactly what he says he is going to do; because it is afraid of the conservatism along these lines which has been so suddenly developed by my opponent. I am talking to you plainly because I believe everybody is entitled to know just what I am going to do. No lure of office nor reaching out after votes can change me one whit in the object I have set out to accomplish. What we set out to do within the Republican party has been accomplished. The same result is going to be accomplished within the government of California."

Very impolitic but very much to the point.

William Kent's Campaign Next Monday, October 10th, William Kent will address the Asiatic Exclusion League of Sacramento. On Tuesday, the 11th, he will commence a campaign of the Sacramento Valley, accompanied by Francis J. Heney. They will speak as follows, in each case (except where otherwise noted) at 8 in the evening: Wheatland, October 11; Marysville, 12th; Sutter City, 13th; Oroville, 14th; Chico, 15th; Orland, 17th (noon) and Willows, 17th (evening); Colusa, 18th, and Woodland, 19th.

WM. KENT'S STATEMENT TO VOTERS

Since the beginning of the primary campaign in which I received the nomination for congress, the Progressive portion of the Republican party has become the dominant factor in that party.

We are no longer insurgents but are regular Republicans, pledged to further those measures that tend to abolish special privilege, and to permit a more equal sharing of our country's opportunities.

I do not believe that our people are much interested in partisan politics or in the spoils of office, but that rather they wish to elect men willing and able to carry out the mandates so clearly given from end to end of the nation. Any man fighting alone in the public interest is comparatively powerless, but an army of men working with the enthusiasm of a great cause, and possessing the public confidence must be efficient in that cause.

It is my belief that in the future as in the past our people can best rely upon a progressive Republican party to accomplish the legislation needed and so unequivocally demanded, wherever public opinion could be expressed at the polls. The nation has given a rousing vote of confidence to the progressive leaders and to the progressive policies, and will without doubt continue that endorsement at the November elections.

The composite platform of Progressive Republicanism upon which the great leaders stand, and in the carrying out of which many new men will join, contains the following planks:

1. The abolition of domination of congress by the speaker.

2. A downward revision of the tariff as a result of exhaustive investigation and detailed reports, by an intelligent and disinterested board of expert men, who recognize neither special interests, nor sectionalism, but rather the welfare of the nation as a whole.

3. The control of common carriers and the regulation of rates to be charged, based on justice alike to patrons and to investors, a thing impossible without physical valuation.

4. The control in the public interest of the

WHAT DID THE PRIMARY PROVE?

ITS ADVANTAGES AND DEFECTS AND SOME SUGGESTIONS FOR IMPROVEMENT

By A. B. NYE

Possibly the meaning of the late primary will be made clearer when the general election takes place, but the official canvass of the vote has been completed, and it seems a good time to sum up results.

For one thing, it has been proven that the people are sufficiently interested in the choice of party candidates to turn out and vote for them when they can do so direct, and not indirectly through delegate conventions. Strange as it may seem, this was not believed by a majority of the politicians. Last spring some of them thought that not to exceed 80,000 votes would be cast for Republican candidates for governor, others said 100,000, and 120,000 was considered an outside estimate. That any person receiving as many as 40,000 votes would be nominated for the office was deemed a fairly safe assumption, and on it one well known aspirant based his hopes and his plan of campaign.

Primary Vote Unexpectedly Large

But on the 16th of August there were cast for Republican candidates for governor more than 215,000 votes. The winner received the suffrages of more than 100,000 electors, and although the second in order among the candidates was something over 40,000 votes behind, he had the support of 55,000 voters, or more than the number supposed to be required to nominate.

The total vote cast for governor, on all tickets, was less by 100,000 than the total vote in the last presidential year, but it was only 40,000 less than the total vote at the state election in 1906. It must be remembered, too, that although 47,000 primary votes were cast for Theodore Bell as the Democratic candidate for governor, there was no contest over that nomination, nor any over other nominations on the Democratic ticket, so that a full turnout at the polls by that party was not to be expected. The five Republicans running for governor received in the aggregate a thousand and more votes than President Taft obtained in California in 1908, and about 90,000 more than the Republican nominee for governor was given in 1906.

People Will Vote If Interested

All of this demonstrates interest—a deep interest—in the primary election on the part at least of the Republicans. Thousands of Democrats gave evidence of their concern in a different manner, when they registered and voted as Republicans. Beyond a doubt most of those who did this were impelled by a desire to take part in the decision of an issue. They saw that there was no real primary election issue in their own party, and they could not refrain from taking a hand in the one which was raging on the Republican side. That the foregoing is the correct explanation of a much controverted phenomenon is apparent from this, that the few counties in which the Democrats have remained dominant in recent years, and in which there were active fights in that party over local nominations, did not show the same strong drift to the Republican side in the primary.

It may be regarded as proven, then, that the majority of electors will vote at primaries when they can feel sure that they are assisting to decide issues which they believe to be important. Because they so generally refused to vote when they could decide issues only indirectly, and most often uncertainly, it had become an aphorism with politicians that the people would not vote at all at primaries, and hence the responsibility came directly home to themselves for bad conditions in government.

Delegate Conventions Useful Until Perverted

At a time in the history of this country when there was a more universal interest in politics, and especially a more continuous interest, the delegate convention plan of making nominations worked well, and when it works well it has manifest advantages over the direct primary. But under present conditions, as they are found in a large part of this and other states, a majority of voters will not make a success of government through round-about methods or long-drawn-out processes; the procedure must be direct and expeditious if there is to be an intelligent participation, or, for that matter, any participation at all, by the greater number of voters. This is the reason why the direct primary, which is a very old idea, is only now taking root and spreading from state to state. Like most things else, it comes when it is needed and not before. Its coming is due to the decay of the convention system, and nowhere was it more decayed than it was in California. Representative government has been the American kind of government for three centuries, and it is not going to be given up before there is a reason for it. Economy of effort is a political as well as an economic law, and so long as the people believed they could secure desired results with less effort through nominating conventions than in any other way they adhered to that plan. They could safely do so as long as delegates truly represented those who voted for them; but it was different when too many of them became mere dummies for adverse influences to play upon. It necessarily makes a difference whether the delegates choose the candidates or whether the candidates choose the delegates. But when both are dictated by the representatives of "the invisible empire" it is time to start some sort of revolution.

The Failure of Machine Methods

Not less striking than the large vote cast at the primary was the tenacity with which electors insisted on voting their convictions when they had them. Here, again, the judgment of the skilled politicians had gone astray. They started in with about their usual degree of confidence in the outcome. They entertained no serious doubt that their familiar methods, a little altered to suit the times, would prove as effective as ever. The machine was still to be dominant because it was the machine. All of the arts were tried, but they failed so far as the voters had clear ideas concerning what they wanted. Popular preferences, which were expected to melt away before the "pressure" and the "pull" of politics joined to big business, insisted on asserting themselves. The vote on governor was one of the best reflections of the popular mind we have ever had in California.

If most of the other results were less conclusive, and if some of them were unsatisfactory, the reason is not far to seek. The governorship was the one office regarding which there was sufficient discussion to enable every voter to arrive at some kind of conviction as to what ought to be done. By election day he knew his own mind, and there was little chance that as to that office his vote would depend on solicitation or influence. As to candidates for other state offices a good many voters evidently had convictions, and quite as evidently others had none. It was not to be expected that the majority could have fixed opinions as to many of those offices, in view of the lack of discussion about them.

Wild Voting Where Voters Were Uninformed

It is useless to expect miracles of the voters. They cannot vote discriminatingly on candidates whom they do not know and about whom nobody stands ready to tell them. It may be regarded as almost wonderful that with no more preparatory discussion concerning the greater number of offices in the list the voters of California did so well. And yet there was a lot of wild voting, showing the lack of acquaintance with candidates and the consequent inability to detect any issue save a personal contest for the honors or emoluments of office. Under such conditions it cannot be said that the ordinary kind of political "work" failed, because the evidences of its success in some instances are only too plainly visible. The existence of a large unattached vote naturally creates the chance for the political worker. If A has no positive opinion regarding whom he shall vote to nominate, and if B does have such an opinion, in five cases out of six A will vote as B suggests or requests. This fact of human nature is the basis of a large part of all the politics done under any system.

Absence of Discussion a Menace

The lack of sufficient informing discussion was the great drawback to the primary, and in some of its aspects was rather alarming. To considerable extent the argument for the direct primary as a substitute for the convention involved the assumption that discussion of the merits of candidates would precede the voting, and the assumption seemed reasonable. It was understood that the candidates would be obliged to make a primary campaign, and presumably a long one, before the day of the election. It had long been one of the objections to the old arrangement that under it there was seldom opportunity to weigh the merits of aspirants to office until after the conventions put them up, when the enlightenment furnished by discussion ceased to be of the highest value because the ordinary voter would put up with an inferior candidate in preference to voting against his party. But with the direct primary, so it was argued, the order would be reversed, the effective discussion would precede the nomination, the pro and con in each instance would be fully presented, and the voter could go to the polls fully prepared to vote intelligently at a time when he could do so without feeling that his independence would embarrass his party.

City Dailies Failed To Inform

Happy will it be if this proves to be the case in future primaries, but it was so far too small an extent on the first trial. On the part of the press the country newspapers made the best record, for some of them had opinions, and expressed them freely, in regard to the candidates for most of the offices; but in the metropolis the voters found comparatively little help extended to them in the columns of the great dailies. I am speaking now more with reference to the legislative, the district and the less important state candidates than with reference to the aspirants to the governorship, for, as before stated, the debate concerning governor was fairly adequate, though certain rather important journals refused to open their columns to editorial discussion of the governorship for fear of embarrassing themselves or their party. This is a consequence of primary campaigning which might well put a curb on the acrimony of newspaper debate, and yet it is apparent that unless candidates can be discussed, and that rather freely, in the party papers before they are voted on, the usefulness of the primary as a selective process will be seriously diminished.

Secondary Offices Neglected

This was made very clear when it came to nominations for offices of secondary, but still considerable importance. Of course the popular interest in these would, under any circumstances, be less; but there are thousands of voters who when the time comes would like to know for whom they ought to vote for railroad commissioner, member of the board of equalization, senator and assemblyman, and it must be said that such voters received the minimum of assistance from the great daily papers. Nor was there any adequate substitute offered, at least in the larger cities, for such lack of newspaper publicity.

Too Many Elective Officers for Choice by Direct Primary

We need not go farther than this point in considering the merits of the direct primary to recognize that while it is ideal in the opportunity it offers for voters to register their intelligent opinions its practical value will depend on

How many intelligent opinions they have to register. In other words, it is rather what goes with the primary election than the election itself which counts. The primary is an excellent means to an end, if it can be properly used, but it is not an end in itself—in which respect it resembles the Australian ballot and all of the other desirable additions to our electoral system which have been made in recent years. The convention system, before it was so perverted that it ceased to be a part of government by public opinion, had this merit, that under it the selection of candidates was usually made by those who knew most about them, or, in other words, the men who were interested in politics and kept themselves informed. With the direct primary the selection of candidates will oftentimes be made by thousands of voters who know nothing about them, unless the educational campaign which precedes it is adequate to accomplish its purpose.

Two Favorable Results of Primary

The two favorable facts concerning the primary which our experience has demonstrated are, first, that the people are interested, and, second, that a majority of them will vote for the right candidates if they know who they are. But in some way the facts must be laid before the voters, and that is a task of almost herculean proportions even when the number of offices to be filled is reasonable, and it is an impossibility when the number of elective officers is beyond reason.

Must Reduce Number of Elected Officers

It follows, then, that there are two things which must be done: the number of officers to be elected must be reduced—a conclusion which has been reached, it was recently stated, by even such a primary reformer as Mr. U'Ren of Oregon—and the program for the campaign of education must be expanded.

Which Officers Should Be Appointed

It would not be too radical if most of the state officers, including the railroad commissioners and members of the board of equalization, should be made appointive. To ask four hundred thousand voters to choose the clerk of the Supreme Court or the superintendent of the state printing office is no more reasonable than it would be to have them elect the chief wharfinger in San Francisco or the head gardener on the state capitol grounds.

In the counties, also, it would be an improvement to have most of the officers appointed, provided the form of our county government could be first changed somewhat. Appointments of county officers by boards of supervisors, when made to fill vacancies, are nearly always vicious because made on the basis of some kind of trade. Appointment is an executive, not legislative, function, and before it will be safe to have appointed county officers it will be necessary to have executive heads of our county governments. (This consideration is one which the promoters of commission governments for cities, in their enthusiasm, have overlooked, with consequences to be learned later.) At any rate, the direct primary plan in the selection of county officers at least in the rural districts, promises to work better than in the choice of some other officers, because a majority of the electors who are to vote for county candidates have some opportunity to become acquainted with them. It is practicable for the county candidates to meet the voters personally, but it is not practicable for a majority of state candidates to do this, or to make a "literature" campaign which will reach all of the voters, except at a cost which is prohibitive.

Facilitating the Pre-Primary Campaign

In what way the pre-primary campaign of education can best be conducted is a question not solved as yet in any state, but there must be some kind of co-operation between the voters and the candidates. The latter cannot do it all, and they will not do it in the way to give the voters most enlightenment. Some sort of non-partisan voters' league, to ascertain and print the facts concerning all candidates, could accomplish a good deal in the right direction, and the work could be extended if independent citizens would organize clubs and invite the candidates to come before them to explain their beliefs and to be "heckled" in the English style.

Direct Primary Useless Without Vigilance

In this last suggestion, I feel confident, is the germ of practical results if it can only be developed. But of one thing citizens may rest assured, and that is that only in the event that they exert themselves along intelligent lines can continued good results be expected from the primary. To relapse into supine confidence that the battle of reform is won through the adoption of the direct primary and that nothing further is needed, would be fatal.

This is only another way of saying that some form of organized effort is necessary to develop the best effects of the primary. Co-operation has always been necessary to good government, and why should any one assume that under the direct primary the necessity will cease and pure individualism will be all sufficient? Most of the best results of the late primary are due to co-operation coupled with a sort of renaissance of the political conscience which has been going on in California for three or four years past. In this organized movement the Lincoln-Roosevelt League took the lead, and, in the main, did the work well. But that league was called into existence by conditions which have already changed and which are likely to be quite swept away in the next two years. It appears to be the judgment of the leaders of the league that it will not be continued, and this makes more clearly apparent the need for something to take its place, and meet the demands of the situation which will exist two or four years from this time.

THE news that the horsethief had been lynched was all over town before breakfast, and soon men, women and children swarmed the jail yard as though there had been a fire. Some said that it was good enough for him, others that it was a shame and a disgrace. The sheriff appeared on the scene in a towering rage and a great hurry, at which many laughed outright. Before the forenoon was half gone all the details of the execution were in the mouths of all, yet all denied being there and all denied complicity with the tragedy.

The face of Jed's father was serious. He took much blame upon himself for not having himself watched the jail, but others said it was a good thing for him that he wasn't on hand or there might have been two men for breakfast that morning instead of one. As for Jed he was ashen and his knees trembled so that he could scarcely stand, yet he was eager to see and hear all that was going on and so mixed with the crowd and listened.

"What are yer 'fraid of?" demanded Hank Woodley, "Yer look like a ghost."

"I ain't 'fraid of nothin', what'r you? You look like a ghost yerself."

"I don't nuther. Yer all wiggly ye'r so 'fraid."

"I don't care if I am," was the reply. "I bet you wouldn't like it ter have one of your friends treated that way."

"Oh, ho! Do you hear that, fellers?" cried Hank Woodley. "Jed says the horsethief was his friend. You bet I'd never let on if he was mine. Horsethieves ain't respectable, horsethieves ain't."

Just then Jed's old doctor, whose plum trees had lately been stripped, and who had been listening to the jibes and jeers of Jed's band, broke in with, "Humph! if you boys don't watch out you'll land just where that horsethief landed, the last one of you. Nothing can be left loose out of sight ten minutes without one of you making off with it down some alley. I haven't had any plum crop to speak of in three seasons. You don't even wait for 'em to get ripe. That's the way horse stealing begins; that shapeless black thing they're fetching out now, that's the way it ends and if you boys don't watch out you'll all die with your boots on, too. You'd better be scared, the last one of you, if you'll listen to me. Humph! Humph!"

The old doctor's harangue, in a voice loud and gruff, had attracted quite a group around the discomfited urchins. Some said it was true, what the doctor said, every word of it and, for their part, they did not see what parents were thinking of, letting their boys run wild the way they did. Even Elder Harford, who could leap a fence without touching hand or foot to it, and had many friends among the boys, even he had to say that he hoped it would be a lesson to all of them.

It wasn't real comfortable for Jed or his band just then, and so they sidled out of the crowd, one by one, as soon as they could. "Let's go and see where they hung him," suggested Frank Russ as the men started off up town with Monroe's body in a spring wagon to hold an inquest, "I know about where it was. I heard one of the men tell." So off they went across the river to a great spreading cottonwood deep in the shadows and so near the Sandy that one could hear the water gurgle over its roots under which the river had washed.

As the boys approached the spot they advanced on tiptoe, as quietly as though they were on a foraging expedition. It was no trouble to find the place. A far-spreading limb, dipping toward the ground, left an ample driveway under it and between the trunk of the tree and the river. It was perhaps a dozen feet above the ground. The approaches had been overgrown with elders and sunflowers and these the team had crushed down. Through them the boys picked their way and soon stood under the big, low-hanging limb. There, sure enough, was the remnant of the rope left hanging after Monroe Scranton had been cut down, perhaps two or three feet of it. Year after year it hung there. For aught the writer knows some shreds of it may be hanging there yet, five and forty years after the tragedy, a warning to successive generations of youths to beware of "hooking" things.

The boys looked up at it with chins fallen.

RECOLLECTIONS OF JED

SOME TRAVAIS OF REGENERATION

BY

A. JUDSON

They spoke seldom and in whispers. If the leaves rustled or a twig fell they were startled and cold shivers chased one another up and down their spines. The gurgle of the river under the roots of the tree added to the gruesome of the situation. "Sh—sh! What was that?" asked Frank Russ under his breath. "I heard something kind of whisper like this, h-h-h!" exhaling as prolongedly as possible.

"Maybe it's his ha'nt," suggested Hank Woodley. "They say that ghosts live in trees, especially where they can hear the water gurgle like filling a jug the way it does here. Let's git out of this."

They got. They ran, half a dozen of them, down the river bank to where the cornfield reached to the river. There they dropped in the warm sand in the shadow of a giant oak.

"Gee, aint it hot!" ejaculated Jed. "Wish we had a watermelon."

"There's a patch out there in the cornfield a ways," observed Hank Woodley. "Wilbur Harper said there was, but I promised not to lead anyone to it because he let me keep his ball bat over Saturday and Sunday."

"I ain't never goin' to hook no more watermelons, nor nuthin' else," declared Jed. "Promised him I wouldn't, cross my heart, hope to die."

"Who's him?" demanded two or three at once.

"Oh, him, him they hanged last night."

"A promise to a horsethief don't count," declared Hank Woodley. "They ain't nobody."

"I don't care, he's better'n you ever was," retorted Jed. "nd he began by stealing watermelons, too. He told me all about it and made me promise not to hook things any more and I ain't agoin' to neither," and then, little by little, Jed told the boys the whole story.

"Huh! 'taint no sin to swipe watermelons if you don't tear up the vines. Everybody says 'taint. I'll bet Jed's father stole more'n a hundred and my father did I know 'cause I've heard him say so," affirmed Frank Russ. "Don't be a baby."

"I'll tell you how we'll fix it," ventured Herb Pomeroy. "Hank Woodley can't hook none 'cause he promised Wilbur Harper he wouldn't lead anybody to the patch. He can only tell where it is, and Jed can't because he's swore off. I can't 'cause my father leads class meeting in Elder Harford's church, and he'd take the hide off me if he ever found it out, but there ain't nothing to hinder Frank Russ and Fred Stevens slippin' in there 'n fetching us out a couple. Everybody is in town now and nobody ain't on the watch."

That seemed reasonable enough to all except Jed, who didn't feel right sure, but it was getting pretty hot and his throat had that parched, burning sensation that always manifested itself whenever he thought of anything as being licking good and he put up no protest.

The boys were not gone long and the melons did go to the right spot sure enough. Jed's throat felt better as soon as he had thrust a chunk of the core of a melon into it. Then he remembered that the office hadn't been swept, that the inquest would probably be all over and he wanted to know what they were going to do with the remains of his friend. One man had said that they ought to be buried in somebody's hog lot, and Jed wondered if they would do that just because Monroe had stolen horses as well as watermelons.

In a little time Jed and his companions had pattered back across the pontoon bridge to town. The inquest had been held, a rough board box made and the corpse dumped into it, and the crowd was on the point of starting to the cemetery, with Elder Harford and Jed's father in the first carriage, the coffin in an express wagon and people in teams and on foot following after. When they got to the little village of the dead on the hill, overlooking the two beautiful valleys, they drove to a rocky swale off in one corner, where a grave had been dug, and lowered the remains into the ground with due solemnity.

Jed's father and Elder Harford stood with heads uncovered, with the rest of the party crowding around anyhow. Elder Harford offered prayer and then "struck up," "Just as I am without one plea," after which he made a short, earnest talk to the crowd, saying, to Jed's confusion and astonishment, that he had reason to believe that the man who lay dead at their feet had died penitent and, what was more, he had sought during his last hours to lead away from the path he had trod an erring boy, a boy who had erred as he had erred, a boy who, like many others in York, had started, all unwittingly, to travel the selfsame road that this horsethief had traveled and who must come to a similar end if they did not repent their evil ways, cease to do evil and learn to do well. It stood fathers in hand, he said, to look after their boys as they had not done. Furthermore, he ventured to hope that the misguided men who had ventured to take the law into their own hands would find grace in the sight of their God and work meet for repentance such as deceased had found.

That evening when the cow had been milked and it began to grow dusk, Jed slipped off by himself to the little cemetery, climbed over the wall and squatted at the foot of the grave of the dead horsethief. He thought of what must have been the agony of that death, of how good natured and jovial Monroe had always been, how easy it might be to begin by stealing horse shoes and end, as Monroe had declared, by stealing horses. Again he crossed his heart and renewed his pledges not to "hook" things any more. His throat ached, the tears came and so occupied was he that he did not notice the approach of a tall figure along the wall until the wall had been overleaped and Elder Harford stood by his side.

Jed bounded to his feet as if to run away, but Elder Harford, who was kindness itself, reached out a hand and asked Jed to stay, took him by the arm and led him to a rocky ledge and sat down.

"He was your friend, Jed?"

"Uh-huh."

"And you had a talk with him yesterday?"

"Uh-huh."

"And he warned you not to do as he had done?"

"Uh-huh. How'd you find that out?"

"Oh! I have ways of finding out things, but are you going to try to keep your promise, Jed?"

"Uh-huh."

"How did you come to 'hook' things, Jed? Your father never did such a thing in all his life."

"All the boys do."

"Not Herbert Pomeroy, I am sure."

"No, but he puts the other boys up to it and helps to eat whatever we get. He did today. I'll bet he's the one that told you!"

"What did he do today?"

"He'll lick me if I tell on him."

"But I'll not tell him that I know." Then Jed told of the watermelon foraging in the benefit of which Herb and Jed had shared without stealing anything themselves.

"Did that seem right to you, Jed?"

"Maybe not, but it was only just watermelons."

Then followed a good, long, kindly talk, during which Jed unbosomed himself as to the whole situation and in which the enormity of such offenses was set forth in plain terms. Before Jed knew what was coming, the tall Elder had crumpled down upon the grass beside him and, holding fast to Jed, prayed for the boys of York, prayed that the tragedy of this dying thief, like the one who died upon the cross, might not prove in vain and, what puzzled Jed the most, the good Elder asked God to forgive him for not understanding the boys of York better and being more to them. He prayed that he might be an humble instrument in God's hand to win the boys of York from their erring ways and fetch them back to the straight and narrow path.

Rising, these two friends walked homeward hand in hand as the stars came out. Elder Harford changed the subject. He talked of the beauty of the valley and how the terraced hills had been made under the ocean ages and ages ago; how great rivers, running from bluff to bluff, had chiseled out the valley and rounded the hills, cutting a new terrace each time the water receded into a new channel, wearing away the rocks and making the fertile lands where people could sometime make homes; that the end and purpose of it all was that men and women might be blessed with sons and daughters to grow into manhood and womanhood ever and always growing more and more into the likeness of their God and His Christ.

It had been a notable day for Jed and a notable day for the town. Jed had opened his own heart and the heart of the town to Elder Harford, who now knew as never before the sources of juvenile delinquency, what the blacksmiths were doing to encourage thefts of iron; the merchants to encourage thefts of bottles and paper rags; the tinsmiths, thefts of copper bottoms to boilers and tea kettles, and the good elder made it his duty, without telling how or why he knew, to make these men understand what they were encouraging and to make them promise to join with him in putting a stop to it.

Then he went to the fathers and mothers of the boys, among others to Jed's own, astonishing them all beyond measure with what he knew, but helping them to inaugurate a general round-up of the lads, and to find something for idle hands to do. The Civil War was just then over and Elder Harford helped to drill the military companies the boys had formed. He took them on excursions to the woods, taught them how to swim, how to make and fly kites, how to make and use bows and arrows and he put baseball on a regulation basis.

As for Jed—well, the printing office had need for him. Betwixt father and mother, more watchful of him than ever before in their lives, and Elder Harford, he had little time to himself for the rest of that summer and until school was in full swing again in September.

No caged bird ever beat harder at the bars than did Jed at the restraints imposed. His father was more firm with him, and his mother more watchful, than ever before in his life. They seemed to Jed to have conspired against his having any fun at all. His father gave him an ever-increasing stint of so much type to set, after which he could play for a little while.

Meantime his head ached, his eyes watered, he set the blackest proof ever known in that office and he believed himself to be downright sick; but what a miracle was wrought in recovery of health the moment the stint was somehow completed. He mounted the stair rail at its head in the last stages of invalidism, but by the time he had glided with the swiftness of light to the sidewalk below he was never better, thank you, and was ready for a swim, a ball game, to play Indian, march with his military company or do whatever the other fellows were doing.

The military spirit ran high and every lad was eager to dress in soldier clothes. There was one way to do it. Soldiers were always passing back and forth between "The River" and the Indian country to the west. They camped on the Indigo and took a swim, making the opportunity the occasion for casting aside their old clothes and donning new. Many of these soldiers were "galvanized Rebs," as they were called, confederate prisoners who had taken the oath of allegiance to the Union and had been sent west to keep the Cheyennes and Sioux pacified, so far as bullets might have a pacific effect upon them.

These cast-off clothes were eagerly pounced upon by the boys of York. They were, for prudential reasons, carried home on sticks, put into a pot or washboiler, a fire kindled underneath out of doors, and they were boiled and boiled and boiled. Then they were dried on the line and ripped into pieces, patched together and made into suits for the boys. How proud they were when a company of a dozen or twenty could be formed in line, all dressed in blue! And the boy who had found a cast-off officer's suit, well, his title to the command could not be questioned.

Jed's understanding of the war had gradually clarified. During the last year or two of it he had kept pace with events as well as the best of them. He rarely failed of meeting the stage at the station when it came in, to hear the latest and to get his father's copy of the latest daily published at a river town and run with it to the office, scanning the headlines on the way. He had read the "Pioneer Boy" and had learned to love "Father Abraham," even more than his own father or Elder Harford.

When news came of the surrender of Lee, Jed forgot all about not "hooking" things, and rustled goods boxes for the bonfire on "Old Flat Top" bluff, with the best and worst of them. When "Sheeney Louie" detected Jed and another boy throwing his boxes over the back fence and pursued them into the street calling them thieves and miscreants, the men drove him back into his house, tore down his fence and carried off and burned fence, boxes and all. Next day, Louie, who was really patriotic but stingy, gave Jed a new soldier cap as a peace offering, and all was well.

But what of the night when the news of the assassination of Lincoln came! The stage was late, for the weather was rainy and the roads bad, and Jed was at home at supper. The one-armed city marshal, who was always at the station when the stage came in, hastened to apprise Jed's father of the awful tragedy. The forkful of food Jed had lifted toward his mouth never reached it. He sank back into his chair, faint and sick. He hurried from the table out into the night. It seemed to him that all was lost, that the war would never cease, that everything must end, that the sun could never shine again or the stars look down upon such a world.

He hastened to the office, where his father was going, to the stage station and the stores to hear or read the particulars of the tragedy. Women were crying, men were wiping tears from their eyes and vowing vengeance. Jed's mother declared that if the war were renewed, and there were not men enough to win the victory, the women would take up arms, and that she knew that she could learn to shoot as well as anybody.

Never had Jed seen his father so aroused. For the first time in his life he spoke (from the office steps) with bitterness of the men of the South, declaring that perhaps God himself had ordained the removal of Lincoln when his great task was done through a fear that his great goodness of heart might make him too lenient toward the traitors to their country. In after months Jed's father reversed that opinion and suffered great unpopularity by declaring that the policy of Lincoln, to bind up the nation's wounds with malice toward none and charity for all, was wisest and best. He regretted the excess of statement into which stress of feeling had betrayed him.

So wore away what, in the family history of Jed, came to be known as, "that bad summer," and school took up, with a new teacher. The pupils were all examined to find out what they knew and where they belonged and, as for Jed's class, it got stuck, as it had done the year before, and did the year after and the year after that, at fractions. Year after year the class began at fractions and ended over in percentage somewhere. No one of the class ever lived to finish the arithmetic, but they graduated and went their several ways without it.

Jed tried hard to keep his promises to the dead horsethief and to Elder Harford. The former he had promised not to "hook" anything any more and, to the latter, he had added the promise not to lie or to swear or fight. He had been foolish enough to announce his policy and his former chums were not slow to take advantage of it. He walked pigeon-toed, for reasons formerly explained. They made fun of him for that, but it mollified him little that their raillery enabled him to break himself of the habit. Because he would not "hook things" and would not fight they called him a "Nanny" and a "Sissy" and shunned him. He was tabooed. He found himself left out of the ball games, nobody chose him when they played "clap in and clap out," or "the needle's eye," and he had to herd with "Honus" or Corydon, whose families were socially off-color and taboo, too. He stood it the best he could from the boys, but when Kate Hayner called him a sissy and ran her tongue out at him he lost all sense of propriety, punched her in the stomach, pulled her hair and broke her comb, which his father had to pay for. This was the unluckiest incident of all, because after that they charged him with being a girl-fighter who didn't dare to fight boys.

As the term advanced the boys became more and more rough with him as they found it increasingly safe to impose upon him. Once they threw him to the ground, made him the bottom of a "nigger pile" and so hurt his crippled arm as to make it bleed profusely, whereat his teacher, with the view of moving the boys to compassion, made him undress his arm and show his wound to the whole school. That was the final humiliation beyond which nothing could go. He remained away from school every chance he got after that, became morose at home, sullen at school and as unhappy as child well could be.

Still he clung to his promises not to hook things, not to lie or to swear and not to fight. He went at it systematically. Upon leaving home in the morning he renewed his vows, to himself, not to do any of these things until school took up. When school took up he searched himself to find if he had kept the faith. At recess he obligated himself anew and, after recess, he recounted to himself all the things that he had done to see if he had kept the faith. This self examination was exactly repeated at noon, at afternoon recess and at night. Often he fell, always he tried again, but, because he failed, he was ashamed to meet Elder Harford face to face and contrived as much as possible to keep out of his way. It made him kind of sneaking. In spite of his love for the Elder he cherished resentment toward him for all he had endured. So wore away the cruel weeks of the fall.

It happened at a ball game of the grown-ups Thanksgiving afternoon. Hank Woodley had been especially aggressive. Immunity from consequences made him so. He was so that day. He told something on Jed that made all the others point the finger of scorn at him and set up the cry in concert, "Nanny, Nanny, Nanny!" meantime pushing him this way and pushing him that. Jed finally lost all sense of obligation and, with as big an imprecation as he knew how to hurl, which he screamed at the top of his voice, he flew at Hank Woodley tooth and claw. He scratched and kicked and struck, threw the boy down and jumped on top of him, struck him in the face, pulled handfuls of hair out of his head and chugged his head up and down on the hard ground. Hank yelled with terror and pain. Jed had set his teeth into Hank's arm and was grinding at his flesh like a demon when a strong hand wrenched him loose, dragged him to his feet and fairly threw him into a buggy and drove with him out of the crowd, which now embraced ball players and all.

It was Elder Harford. Jed's own wounded arm was bleeding profusely. The blood had saturated his sleeve and ran from his finger tips. "Jed, Jed, what do you mean by such actions?" Elder Harford demanded sternly as he drove toward Jed's home.

"I just couldn't stand it no longer," declared Jed between sobs.

"What had Hank done to you?"

"He told on me."

"What had you done that he could tell on you?"

"Asked his forgiveness."

"What had you asked his forgiveness for?"

"For fighting him."

"What did you fight him for?"

"For pestering Link." (Link was the diminutive son of Edom, son of Ham.)

"What did he do to Link?"

"Oh, he threw him down, tore his clothes, called him 'nigger, nigger, nigger,' ran off with his hat and wouldn't give it to him again, so I pitched into him."

"Then you asked his pardon afterward?"

"Yes, 'cause I had told you I wouldn't fight, but I did."

"And he told the boys that you had asked his pardon and they jeered at you and called you Nanny?"

"Uh-huh, and I sailed into him again just anyway I could. I'd just as he'd have killed him as not. I'll bet you couldn't stand it to be picked on that way every day and all the time, and called a coward and a sissy and Nanny and everything when you 'aint afraid of none of 'em. I'll just bet you couldn't, and I won't. I'll do the other things I said I would, but I'll fight those fellers to a finish every time they give me any of their lip. I don't care what you say, or papa or mamma or anybody," and Jed stood upright in the buggy, looking the Elder squarely in the eye as though he would as soon fight him as anybody.

"Sit down, child," the good Elder said, "I am afraid you have had great provocation, great provocation. I did not know that boys could be such little beasts. I think more than likely I should have done as you did under such circumstances. It may be wrong, I don't know. I shall take it to God in my prayers tonight. It seems sometimes as though the Master asked more of us, almost, than flesh and blood can bear. They'll probably let you alone from now on. If they do not, well, don't be the aggressor, but don't submit to indignity. I wouldn't and neither would your father. It isn't right for us to ask more of you than we should exact of ourselves."

By that time they had reached Jed's own gate and Jed's mother advanced to meet them. His plight told plainly enough what had happened. Can Jed never forget those great, pained, surprised eyes that looked him through and through when he was detected in some delinquency? "Certainly not in this world; it may be in the next, but not here."

"Don't scold him," said the Elder. "He did as his father or I would have done under similar circumstances. I think that somehow Jed and I will yet solve this problem of youthful delinquency. I am afraid that I had forgotten what it is like to be a boy, but Jed is teaching me. I am learning more of him than he of me. But, Jed, child, don't hate. Whatever you do, don't hate. That lust to kill—my God, boy, smother that; that is awful. Fight if you must to protect yourself, but not to kill, only to punish; not to kill, never to kill."

As Jed passed through the gate, listening to the words of the Elder, he looked back and up into a face that he never forgot. It was a face expressive of sympathy, of doubt, of uncertainty, of profound concern. Instead of advising to suffer all things in meekness, and to turn the other cheek to be smitten also, as the Master had commanded, he had advised the resenting of an indignity, fighting to hold one's own, only not to kill, merely not to kill. He had drawn the line at that. Had he, therefore, also denied his Lord? It was all writ in his face. Jed's mother understood. To Jed it was only an unforgettable look.

judiciary, that whatever amendments may be made, the code establishes the law of this state, respecting the subjects to which it relates, and its provisions and all proceedings under it are to be liberally construed with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice. This is the guiding star for the courts, the polar principle—liberal construction and the promotion of justice."

These are not the rhetoric of the hustings nor the light words of the careless speaker. They are the wisdom of mature age, formulated out of a lifetime of rich experience and seasoned judgment. They are backed by a record of forty years of unremitting service of the public in one capacity or another, and by an earned reputation for impregnable integrity.

Judge Coffey's present reputation is based upon his probate work. But his years of general practice, in all branches of the law, should not be forgotten in an estimate of his capacity as a lawyer. Neither should be forgotten the experience he has had in the trial of great will contests, where a thorough knowledge of procedure and the rules of evidence were required, as well as knowledge of the probate law.

If the judgment of San Francisco, legal and lay alike, is to be believed, Judge Coffey is one of the ablest, most upright and most genuinely useful men in public life today.

great corporations doing an interstate business. In this matter, it must be frankly recognized that combinations are inevitable, that competition can no longer be trusted to remedy overcharge. Capital can no more be forced to competitively fight capital than men can by law be forced into personal encounters with their neighbors. Control is the only remedy.

5. The purging of the national temple of the political power of those great special interests that have impudently legislated against the public welfare.

6. The spread of the merit system of public employment, especially in the postal service, to the end that that great department of the government, may be cleared of partisan politics, and that public servants may no longer be used as cogs in any political machine.

The installation of a national parcels post as a relief from the extortions of the express companies and as a means of making the department a paying business.

The curtailment of the franking privilege, and the abolition of that privilege as used in political campaigns.

7. The enactment of laws that shall carry into effect the conservation policies, both as affecting the natural resources of the nation and also our human resources, to the end that there shall be a more equal sharing of the bounties of nature, and that human life may be lived more safely, more broadly and more happily, and that the waste of life now incident to many occupations employing men, women and children may be reduced to a minimum.

8. The revision of our immigration laws to the exclusion of all undesirable immigrants and all who cannot be assimilated into our democracy. We must exclude Asiatics or forfeit the future of the Pacific Coast as a home of democratic opportunity.

9. The election of United States senators by direct vote of the people and the extension where possible of the principles of direct legislation.

10. The graduated income tax.

The development of waterways.

These are among the national policies for which I have always stood, and for which I shall always stand.

As concerns this district, I shall, if elected, study carefully and in detail the needs of the various sections, and shall do all in my power to obtain such federal aid as may fairly come to the district; in which effort I shall not be handicapped by a congress or by a speaker hostile to progress, or demanding in return my allegiance to reactionary measures.

I shall not bind myself in caucus against this platform, nor against my conscience.

I shall not recognize partisanship where partisanship runs counter to the public welfare.

I shall diligently attend to the public business and shall consider myself a public servant and not a part of a political machine.

I hope to represent all the people of the second district regardless of their party affiliations and furthermore to be free from sectional prejudice as befits one who represents the nation.

THE TAX-REFORM AMENDMENT

By Carl C. Plehn

Article No. 6

The first of these articles gave an outline of the amendment; the second and third discussed the evils of the present system; the fourth advanced the reasons for separation of state from local taxation; the fifth presented the reasons why the larger corporations should be taxed by the higher authority, the state. This one will discuss the advantages of the gross earnings taxes.

Each of the taxes proposed for each of the different classes of corporations is a more just and a more efficient tax for that class of corporations than the ad valorem tax now in force.

Gross earnings taxes are better for the public than ad valorem taxes: (1) because they are simpler and easier to administer, they can not be evaded, and can be enforced without the exercise of judicial discretion by any officer; (2) because they increase more steadily and more rapidly than do the property taxes.

This rapidity of increase is strikingly illustrated by the experience of Illinois. The Illinois Central railroad, by a contract in its charter, pays the state a percentage of its gross earnings, in lieu of all other taxes. All other railroads in the state pay on their property. The taxes of the Illinois Central increase by fifty per cent every decade. Those of the other roads by twenty-five per cent in each decade. Minnesota also shows a splendid rate of increase of railroad taxes under the gross earnings plan, the taxes doubling each decade. Similar results are to be found in the history of these taxes in Wisconsin. We have already seen what a partial application of this rule does in California. That was shown in the last article, a jump from $1,300,000 to $2,200,000 in five years. As a matter of fact, the gross earnings will increase more rapidly than the investment.

Gross earnings taxes are better and fairer to the companies also as well as of advantage to the public. In its report of 1906 the state tax commission said:

Railroad officials, as a rule, are strongly in favor of the gross earnings tax. Their chief reasons are its simplicity, the ease of administration, and, above all, the fact that it always enters in the same proportion into their accounts, so that its effect upon their business is always uniform. It is natural for railroad officials to look upon taxes as an expense incident to business done. If a road does more business this year than last, it buys more coal, pays more wages, and, under this plan, would pay more taxes. Entering in this manner into their accounts, it is not a disturbing nor an arbitrary entry requiring explanations, as would an increase in taxation in face of a decrease in business. Furthermore, the tax varies from year to year in direct proportion to the fund out of which it must be paid. The tax is, therefore, always in proportion to the road's ability to pay.

That the railroads themselves favor this plan is no evidence that it is one adverse to the public interest. Simplicity, ease, and cheapness of administration, and certainty of returns, are advantages to the government as well as to the taxpayer. Steadiness of growth in revenue is another advantage. The revenue derived from a gross earnings tax will grow with the growth of the community, and will in the long run keep pace therewith. In this respect it affords a decided advantage over the property tax. The assessment of property tends to become stationary or to advance at a constantly decreasing rate. Only some radical change in the law or in the administration thereof can counteract this tendency.

Then there is the difficulty of apportioning these taxes. At present the assessed valuation is apportioned among the counties on a mileage basis and taxed by the counties as they please. That sparsely populated rural districts should levy tolls on passing commerce sufficient to enable them to meet all their local expenses is too rankly unjust to be tolerated. The proceeds of the taxes on the great agencies of commerce belong by right to the people of the state as a whole.

What has been said as to the steam railroads applies equally to street railroads. Even an assessor of great ability and unusual experience can only guess approximately at the value of these complex properties. In the great power companies we have a new development that has grown up since the tax system was adopted and entirely outside of it. Had these existed in 1880 when the assessment of the railroads was turned over to a state board the power companies, that string their lines through many counties would have gone under the control of that board. The county assessors cannot, by scanning a few miles of poles and wires, arrive at any conception of the value of the property as part of a great system.

The express companies have for a long time served as the stock illustration of the absurdity of a property tax on a great going concern. In the famous "Ohio Express Company cases" the Supreme Court of the United States points out the absurdity of "taxing a business that earned $275,446 in a single year on the basis of $23,400 worth of horses, wagons and safes."

Why should a car company that sends hundreds of cars into the state in the fall of the year be taxed only on the one or two or no cars that are here on the first Monday in March? Why should the Pullman Company, that ever recalcitrant operator of "moving hotels," be allowed to defy the sovereign people of this state and refuse to pay any taxes at all?

Dr. Stanton Coit, of London, distinguished for his writings on ethical subjects, will lecture at the Auditorium, corner of Page and Fill more streets next Friday evening, October 14th. His subject will be, "Religion and the National Idealism of America."

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Lunacy Commission

Section 2136 of the Political Code of California declares that there shall continue to be a State Commission in Lunacy to consist of five members, to wit: the General Superintendent of the State Hospitals, the Secretary of the State Board of Health and the three members of the State Board of Examiners. The State Board of Examiners, it will be remembered, consists of the Governor, the Secretary of State and the Attorney General, all three of whom have all the business they can attend to in their own departments and, unless they neglect their regular work, they can not have more than a speaking acquaintance with the highly important department of the care of the insane of the state.

The truth of this became so manifest that the law was early so amended as to provide substitutes for these officers in the persons of, first, the Secretary of the State Board of Examiners, who takes the place of the Governor when the Governor is not present, which is most of the time, but, alas for the system! the Secretary of the State Board of Examiners has all that he can do to attend to the duties of his own office, and as outside man for the Governor, so that the commission is little strengthened by his addition to the Lunacy Commission. Second, the Assistant Attorney General or Deputy Attorney General is authorized to take the place of his chief on the board, but the same holds true with regard to him. He has too much to do to fit himself to discharge with intelligence and competent knowledge the duties of so important a board. In brief, there is just one man on that commission whose special knowledge of the work in hand fits him for the duties of that commission and that is the General Superintendent of State Hospitals. All the other members are practically dead timber.

Worse than being dead timber, the ex-officio members of the State Lunacy Commission subdivide the responsibility that should rest on the General Superintendent and they make it more difficult for him to do what he ought to do with the business in his hands. In practice, if he wishes to do, or permit to have done, any particular thing he must round up these ex-officio members, explain the matter to them, make them understand the need for it if he can, get their consent and then share the responsibility with them for whatever was done or not done. It is exactly how not to have the duties of an executive office efficiently, expeditiously and responsibly performed. If the people of the state can find a man big enough to be governor he can find a man big enough to be General Superintendent of all the hospital business of the state, the governor being responsible for him and he being responsible to the governor. The need is to wipe this Lunacy Commission off the state books and place its duties in the hands of a State Commissioner in Lunacy, or a State Department of Defectives and Insane.

But then, as often pointed out in this department, that is a form of reform that needs to go like a rip-saw right through our whole system of state government, and the sooner the better.

The powers of the commission are, in brief, to appoint the necessary officers and attaches, including someone to expert books (which should be done by the State Examiner); to fix the salaries of the officers and attaches of the several hospitals (which should be done by the Governor and his cabinet or heads of department sitting in council); to determine and provide for the needs of the several hospitals and advise the legislature accordingly.

The duties of the commission are, to take charge of the execution of the laws relating to incompetent persons; visit and examine into all the affairs of all the hospitals, public or private, having insane or incompetent persons in charge; to prescribe needful rules and regulations for operating the several hospitals and see to it that they are observed; to keep records of all persons committed to the state hospitals, with full particulars in each case; to transfer patients from one institution to another as the good of the hospital service may require; to report biennially to the Governor all important facts relating to the hospital service; to investigate all cases where there are reasons for suspecting that persons are wrongfully restrained under commitment for being insane or otherwise incompetent; to aid in the collection of sums due the state from the property or family of persons committed to state hospitals; to look after all state properties connected with the state hospital service; to furnish the legislature with estimates of the probable revenues needed by each of the hospitals for the ensuing biennial period, the improvements required and all other information for the guidance of the legislature in legislating on behalf of the state hospital service.

The care of the incompetent and insane is becoming a great burden in California and demands more attention than it has received either from public or legislature. Little is ever done by a legislature for the betterment of any public service in advance of public demand, and the public has not been well enough informed about this service to be in a condition to make intelligent demands upon the legislature.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE

A full line of Theosophical Literature from Point Loma, California, the headquarters of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society, under the leadership of Katherine Tingley, is now on sale at A. M. Robertson's, 222 Stockton St., S. F., and at Smith Bros., 462 13th St., Oakland, California.

We would especially mention the Century Path, a weekly illustrated, which is a work of art as to its typography and illustrations, while the subject matter is of the highest order, which deals with the problems of the day from a Theosophical standpoint; also the Theosophical Manuals, written with a view of meeting the interest of inquirers; a Point Loma edition of "The Key to Theosophy," by H. P. Blavatsky, written especially for students; "Studies in Occultism," also by the same writer, and "Echoes from the Orient," by William P. Judge, successor to Madame Blavatsky. To one who is interested in the ancient Wisdom Religion these books will be of the deepest interest.

All of the above are the product of the Aryan Theosophical Press at Point Loma, and it will easily be conceded that their work will compare with any in artistic finish and accuracy.

Theodore Hit It

WHEN THEODORE ROOSEVELT WROTE to Meyer Lissner that, "Failure to elect Stimson in New York and Johnson in California would be a blow to good citizenship," he did not mean to be understood as affirming that either Dix or Bell would stand for bad citizenship, but only that the failure to make complete the partial victory of good Republicanism over bad Republicanism in both states would prove a set-back to good Republicanism all over the nation, and good Republicanism is good citizenship. It would. He hit it.

Vote For Two

LET NO VOTER FORGET that he is to vote for two candidates for the supreme court. If any voter have a partiality for either Sloss or Bledsoe or Melvin let him vote for his man for one of the vacancies, but, as he loves fair play and believes in rewarding true merit, courage, and a robust, manly character, let him be sure to cast one vote for Judge William P. Lawlor, the San Francisco judge before whom the protesting San Francisco grafters were tried without prejudice to their rights, and yet with an unswerving regard for the rights of The People. He proved himself a rock of faith and courage. He should be remembered when the voter goes into his booth to face his ballot and his God.

The Saloons After Wallace

ALBERT J. WALLACE is a terrible sort of fellow to be in politics. He goes to church and he does not go to saloons! We do not know whether Timothy Spellacy goes to church or not, but he does go to saloons, and this much is pretty thoroughly abroad: the saloon vote is going for Spellacy and after Wallace. There is a difference. Every Republican who ranks the saloon above the church will vote for Spellacy. Every Democrat who ranks the church above the saloon should vote for Wallace. That will right the wrong to Wallace and give Spellacy no better than his due.

Gospel of Minimum Wage

FRANCE IS BEING HELD in the grip of a general strike and the power of the French army has been called upon to break that grip. The cause of the trouble is the demand of railroad workers that there shall be a minimum wage of a dollar a day. The gospel of the minimum wage is spreading. The time is coming when any contract made to work for less than a minimum wage will be both void and punishable. When that time does come shop girls will not have to piece out their incomes by living at home or in harlotry, and common labor will not have to choose between helotism and vagabondage. At last the wages issue has reached below the poverty line. Hitherto the lift has been from the top rather than from the bottom rung of the industrial ladder, and the poor, the very poor, have had little done for them. The best paid workers have done the most striking.

Ferrer

AT THE HOUR THIS IS WRITTEN it appears that Spain may pass the anniversary of the execution of Ferrer without a revolution, or even a serious disturbance, thanks in part to the vigorous action of Premier Canalejas and "Butcher" Weyler and, in part, to the indifferent esteem in which even the anarchists of Spain held Ferrer. He was a man of ability, but of no moral character, and Spaniards care nothing for him, but only for his execution, which was both an outrage and a political blunder. If Spain were of one mind it would speedily be a republic, but there are as many Spains as provinces in Spain with more to hold them apart than to bring them together. Not even the god of battles can make a Republic out of that.

Put It To a Vote

AT MARYSVILLE, FRANCIS J. HENEY, in speaking on behalf of the candidacy of William Kent, said: "I do not believe that you want your representative in congress to trade off some great principle of human liberty in this country in order to get a postoffice building for Marysville." There isn't a politician of the old guard who would not give Mr. Heney odds on the postoffice side of that issue and, so far as this paper knows, Mr. William Kent is the only candidate for congress who has dared to stake his candidacy on the human liberty side. We shall know how Marysville stands on that issue when the votes are counted. Having faith in The People, this paper is betting on Kent.

The Savings of the People

AT THE BANKERS' CONVENTION at Los Angeles William R. Creer, of Cleveland, declared that the increased cost of living had made serious inroads upon the savings of the people deposited in savings institutions; that, following the panic of 1907, the cost of living had increased while wages had decreased, and that unless there could be a speedy readjustment of differences between wages and living our savings depositories will soon confront serious problems. That is a test that there is no getting away from. It was indignantly denied by the Cannon-Aldrich combination that the Republican party had ever promised to so reduce the tariff as to reduce the cost of living. It "better had."

The Purity Congress

SUCCESS TO THE PURITY CONGRESS in session in this city. It has to deal with humanity's primal and most potential curse. The easiest way to deal with the problem is to resolve, as did the W. C. T. U. of Berkeley, that there shall be "no compromise with evil," and then repair to safeguarded homes full of satisfaction with self and indignation at those who would try to control what cannot be prevented. But that leaves the evil about where it was found and neither lessens the red plague nor safeguards the home. Frankly, The California Weekly is not wise enough to know what should be done, but it would suggest that a museum of the horrors of the licentious life, through which to take male and female adolescence in the company of a competent teacher, together with an insistent demand for a living wage for working women, might be attempted with advantage. Else the gospel according to Bernard Shaw, that the "Best thing a poor girl can do under existing industrial and social conditions is to be good to some man who can afford to be good to her, in wedlock if she can, but outside of it if she must," will make more converts than the W. C. T. U. and Purity Congress combined. A mere refusal to compromise with evil never yet saved a human body from profanation or a soul from hell, but it is as easy as rolling off a log. The way of Paul was better in that he made himself, "all things to all men that he might by all means save some."

Islais Creek

Our leading article this week deals with the proposal to vote $1,000,000 in state bonds, the same being a mortgage upon the harbor revenues of San Francisco, for the purchase of submerged lands in the heart of San Francisco to be used, in the process of time, for wharfing purposes. The bonds should be voted and the land acquired.

Ninety per cent of the harbor approaches of this nation are owned by the railroads, and the greater part of what remains is owned by private persons or corporations. Whoever owns the approaches to a world's highway, to all purposes owns that highway, and it ought not to be privately owned. Every pound of freight going in or out is subjected to a tax for the benefit of the wharf owners. It is by such processes as these that the earnings of the many are diverted into the pockets of the few. It is against public policy. It should be opposed at every point at every opportunity. Islais creek is one point and affords one opportunity. Make the most of it.

This is not saying that the state should or should not own and control wharfing privileges, or that the port cities should or should not, or that the national government should or should not. These are issues that need to be taken up and settled, but their settlement does not require the postponing of the Islais creek issue to a later date. That should be settled now and settled right, and no such issue can be settled right that is not settled in favor of some form of public ownership of access to deep water.

San Francisco has a direct and palpable interest in securing for the benefit of its trade public control over this important interior basin. It means much to the commerce of San Francisco to have it have unvexed access to landing and loading facilities, to the bringing of ship and car together free of the pleasure of any private interest and without being mulcted by usurious tolls. No city can be commercially great with its commerce in chains.

But the interest of the state of California is greater. A great share of the commerce of the state must go in and out through the Golden Gate and, in part, in and out of Islais channel. Can the state afford to relinquish all its interests to the city of San Francisco, trusting to its far-seeing and enlightened self-interest to guard the freedom of the commerce of the commonwealth? Perhaps so. That is a matter to be determined.

What of the nation? The shipping that goes in and out through the Golden Gate, or that shall pass in or out of Islais channel, is of immediate concern to the commerce of the whole nation. Can the nation afford to leave its larger, and therefore paramount, interest in the wharfing facilities requisite for the nation wholly to either city or state?

These are issues that need to be wrought into a definite national, state and municipal policy, but the Islais creek project cannot wait for their threshing out, and there is no need that it should. It is sufficient to affirm that access to the world's highway must be under some form of public, and never under any form of private control. Stick a peg there, and then vote for the bonds.

Justice Sloss On Justice

On Saturday of last week Justice M. C. Sloss addressed the City Club of Los Angeles on "Reform of the Criminal Law." The address was instructive, and indicates what the legislature, by and with the advice and consent of the appellate courts (without which nothing can be done), chiefly ought to undertake to do.

But first let us take a fall out of the Judge while we may. He declared, what no judge ever loses an opportunity to declare, that "The duty of the judge is to declare, not to make, the law." That is a fiction solemnly promulgating the corridors of time hand in hand with John Doe and Richard Roe, but it is not now and never was wholly true. It is true only in theory. In practice whoever declares the law makes the better part of it. No trained lawyer will pretend to know what a statute means no matter what it says, until it has been put through the judicial transformer and has been "declared," by which time the maker of the statute will, very likely, be unable to recognize it. The courts remake all the law that is made, and very little of it would be serviceable unless remade. Statute law should be crystalized judicial decision, but, somehow, the process has been reversed and law, real law, is now a judicially transformed statute. The older method was better. It is only with practice that that ancient fib can be judicially pronounced without involuntarily winking the other eye.

But that is aside from the important suggestions made by Mr. Justice Sloss. As he views the issue of the better administration of criminal justice in this state the appellate court should have the power to review the facts as well as the law, touching those points upon which the case may hinge, in order to ascertain if, where errors have been committed by the trial courts, those errors did in truth work a substantial injury to the constitutional rights of the accused. This is the English system. It works well there and should work well here.

Judge Sloss thinks that the state should have the same right to a change of venue that the accused has. The truth of this was so forced upon the public mind during the trial of the graft cases as to leave small room for question. Another reform suggested is the permitting of a verdict, in all except capital or life imprisonment cases, by three-fourths rather than a unanimous vote of the jury. The public mind is ready for that, too. Another suggestion is that the constitutional right of the accused to decline to testify against himself should be so far modified as to permit the jury to treat as evidence the fact that he does not testify on his own behalf when if he had testified his testimony must have tended to establish his innocence if really innocent. Public sentiment has long since taken this view. Whoever refuses to testify should do so at his peril.

With the abrogation of the strict rule now obtaining in California relative to the refusal of the accused to testify, Justice Sloss thinks there should go the prohibition of receiving all confessions obtained by "third degree" methods. We would not go so far as that, but would seek to prohibit and punish the application of "third degree" methods when once our criminal jurisprudence has been so transformed as to make the conviction of the guilty probable without their application.

There were other sound suggestions in Justice Sloss's address. The important consideration is, however, how to make them effective. Our penal statutes are now and have been framed by legislators who have no deep insight into the establishment of justice as a problem of government, but, rather, by those a part of whose function in life is to save from prison those who should be in prison. The lawyers elected to the legislature, left to themselves, will never adequately reform our civil or criminal procedures.

But if a commission could be constituted, composed of one or two legislator lawyers, one or two legislators from unprofessional walks of life, Judge W. P. Lawlor and Justice M. C. Sloss, sitting together five hours a day five days in the week for three weeks, they would evolve a criminal code that would be sound, flexible, just to the accused and to the state and efficient to the end in view—the establishment of justice. Why cannot such a commission be constituted the second or third legislative day of the forthcoming session, with instructions to report by the time the session is half over?

They Will Get What They Want

It is the duty of bankers to be conservative and it is the duty of conservatives to hold fast to that of the past which has proven its right to live, but it is no part of the duty of conservatism to resist progress. That is Bourbonism, and Bourbonism is suicide in the first degree. The temptation of bankers toward Bourbonism is constant. Reference is here made to bankers, real bankers, not speculators and promoters of the Morse, Bartnet, Dalzell Brown stripe, who open banks that they may come into possession of other peoples' money to gamble with. Not more than half to two-thirds of the bankers of this country are real bankers. Some go so far as to say that America has no bankers, but, allowing that two-thirds are bankers, the other third are wild-catters and should have their financial heads chopped off.

Now the bankers of California are being looked to to defeat amendment number one. In New York state the bankers are being looked to to defeat what they are pleased to call Rooseveltism by turning the state over to the Democrats. Reports from Washington have it that the great banking interests are financing Bourbonism wherever it can be found. They are making a mistake, the same kind of a mistake that the bull made when he tried to butt the on-coming express train off the track.

And it is a pleasure to note that Benjamin Ide Wheeler had the courage to warn the bankers of America, lately assembled at Los Angeles, against making this mistake, although the language he used was far more chaste, less blunt but fully as expressive as ours. He admonished his hearers to know the American people, to know them East and West, North and South, and he declared that whoever comes to know them will come to trust them and to place faith in their essential right-mindedness, and will not be pessimistic regarding the future.

President Wheeler then proceeded to inform his banker hearers that the American people are going to get what they want and that they are coming to know, if not exactly what they do want, at least what they do not want and do not propose to put up with. Among the things that they do not want and will not tolerate are, an ill-adjusted and unjust tariff, the burning up of the country's resources under forced draft, government by consolidated wealth and the conferring of the elective franchise upon the American dollar.

He assured the American bankers that the American people "will get what they want" which, in a phrase, is the "plain and accurate expression of the popular will." "Property rights are not menaced, the pillars of the state are not undermined. It will only be when the government does not express the people's will, and the people come to believe that they cannot make it express it, that real peril will arise."

Benjamin Ide Wheeler has been accused of toadying. If he were a toady there would have been a place to manifest the spirit of a toady. The temptation would have been irresistible, but there was not a suggestion of toadyism in what he did say. He is not guilty. On the contrary, he spoke the things that the assembled bankers of America most needed to hear. Theodore Roosevelt could scarcely have done better, and it is to be hoped that the bankers will take it to heart. The American people will "get what they want," and what they want is a square deal.

Moral Prophylaxis

This paper is not one to make a protest against prudery an excuse for prurience, and yet it will be plain spoken. The issue raised in a recent address by Judge William H. Waste, of Alameda county, relative to physical examinations as prerequisites to marriage, is worthy of thoughtful consideration by all lovers of their race. Let us open the discussion by restating a few perfectly obvious but commonly tabooed propositions, to wit: "Male and female made he them;" the purpose of marriage is progeny; copulation is incident thereto; whoever is venereally diseased is unfit to procreate; the sexual sins of the fathers are visited, first, upon their wives and then upon their children to the third and fourth generation, by which time their strain will certainly have run out, as it is more than likely to do with the first or second. The way of carnality is death.

The American Society of Sanitary and Moral Prophylaxis asserts that one-eighth of all human diseases are venereal in their origin; that sixty per cent of the men of this country become infected by some one of these diseases at some time in their lives; that seventy-five per cent of all the special surgical operations performed on women have a venereal origin, that fifty per cent of those once infected become irremediably sterile and very many of them are condemned to life-long invalidism; that seventy to eighty per cent of the ophthalmia (inflammation) that blots out the eyes of infants is attributable to this cause and that twenty per cent of all blindness is due to gonorroccus infection; that practically all these inflections upon innocent humanity result from the infection of virtuous wives by husbands who have been licentious before marriage, more than half before their twenty-fifth year. Syphilitic infection is transmitted directly to offspring, killing sixty to eighty per cent before birth or soon after; even the one out of every four or five that makes shift to live is generally subjected to degenerative changes that tend to make life miserable if not a burden to society.

This is the problem that moral prophylaxis presents to thoughtful minds for consideration. Is it one to be ignored because it is not nice? You who have innocent daughters that you wish to see happily settled in life, daughters whom you have warded from all that is unclean, can you afford to ignore a risk so serious? You who have sons whom you hope to live to see become the fathers of your grandchildren and to perpetuate your strain to remote generations, can you afford to keep from them as a sealed book a knowledge of the consequences which may follow their lapse from that which is clean?

The writer of this does not know that the figures given above are scientifically accurate, or that they are not examples of that overstatement which characterizes the denunciations of reformers with a single idea, but this he does know from what he has seen in the institutional life of this country: the licentious life is nature's premier curse upon mankind. Whether or not Judge Waste's suggestion of a physical examination, at least of men, as a prerequisite to marriage, is the wisest preventive measure that may be taken, it is a subject that needs to be dealt with at least to the extent of making the truth known. There is no longer any need that men should sin in ignorance of the consequences likely to befall those whom they best love in all the world.

Ships and Battleships

A conference of delegates from Pacific Coast states is to be held in San Francisco next month for the double purpose of bringing a part of the American navy to this coast to remain and to influence a ship-subsidy plan for the encouragement of an American merchant marine.

Let us be entirely frank about these issues. There is no enemy in sight on either shore. The Atlantic coast wishes to retain, and the Pacific to secure, the presence of battleships primarily because of their purchasing and not their defensive power. Battleships are liberal spenders. To avoid being whipped in detail in the event of war the sea power of the nation should be so massed as to crush in detail the fleets of its enemy wherever found. Therefore pull Dick, pull other fellow, for the battleships, but for all or none. After the Panama canal shall have been completed the American fleet may be divided with more safety.

An American merchant marine cannot be sustained in free competition with the rest of the world. That has been tried and has failed. To so subsidize American vessels as to carry half of America's outgoing and incoming trade, and still maintain American standards of wages for seafaring men, American built ships and an American standard of return for the employment of American capital, would endanger, if it did not result in, the bankruptcy of the country.

Therefore, the most that any ship-subsidy advocate cares to declare for is the subsidizing of a few strategic lines in the hope that some good may result to American trade and for the encouragement of the American marine and, at the same time, have available a certain number of auxiliary vessels for use, upon which the American government shall have claim in the event of war.

Rather than embark in an enterprise so doubtful in principle and policy this paper suggests that the United States government build and establish these strategic, tentative American steamship lines and operate them on such a basis as it may be able to, making them earn all they can, to be applied on their cost of construction and operation, thus having them ready in the event of war with trained men aboard upon an instant's notice.

Respectfully submitted for further consideration by the Pacific Coast Conference.

How the Fires Occurred

Much anxiety has been felt as to why the great conflagrations in the timbered regions of Montana and Idaho were permitted to occur despite the governmental system of forest control. Elsewhere in this paper will be found a most interesting and satisfactory explanation, the first we have seen in print. Our brethren of the press will confer a public favor by reproducing that article or giving their readers its substance in other form.

The bitter experience Minnesota has just gone through, albeit not on forest reserve lands, emphasizes the necessity for taking heed elsewhere. The governor of that state declared that enough was lost in the fire of the past week to have paid for forest protection for the whole state for fifteen years. That is inexcusable waste. California also is guilty.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Mountain climbing is a passion. It is dangerous. It is the thrill of danger and the thirst for overcoming obstacles that give it its zest, but what's the use? In Switzerland there is a woman watching the face of a glacier day by day in the expectation that, in a little while, its receding wall will uncover a bunch of roped-together corpses swallowed up forty years ago. For what purpose? Oh, that they might get to the top of a mountain that no one else had ever climbed? Perhaps being talked about in the papers may have been another motive. If that be the only purpose, Dr. Cook's device for getting talked about without having endured the risks of climbing Mount McKinley rather shines by comparison.

It all depends on what is at the top. The discovery of the north pole cost millions of money and hundreds of lives. After Peary got there he found that there was nothing there, but it is important to the world to know that there is nothing there. The effort, the risks, the losses, were not in vain, for the sum of the world's knowledge of the world has been increased, but, unless some fact of importance remains to be solved, every subsequent expedition to the north pole will be squandered effort, fool-hardy risk and a wasting of life and substance.

It all depends on what is at the top. If life be risked to climb a mountain side that has been climbed a hundred times before where is the gain and where the justification? The instinct to climb is inherent. It is a good instinct. It can be devoted to that which is praiseworthy, but the risking of life "just to be doing," that is not praiseworthy. It is to be condemned.

This jewel we call life, how incomparably precious it is! Think of the cost of motherhood, of the years of care in childhood, of the long years of preparation for some work in life, of our place in the lives and affections of others, of the niche we might usefully fill? Is all to be sacrificed on the altar of a whim? Is all to be risked at the suggestion of an unreasoning impulse?

So far as we know this is the only time we shall live the life we now have. We may go on living under other conditions elsewhere when this life ends, but the likelihood is that this is our only chance to live this life. That makes life precious, the most precious thing in the world except the well-being of the race. For that well-being we may be called upon to yield up life, but for nothing short of that. For the well-being of the race countless hosts have yielded up life and counted it a joy to do it, but to do it for any purpose short of the highest good is to hold in mean esteem the most priceless gift the God of all the universe had to bestow. What shall the soul say to its maker when the demand is to know why the tenanted body was taken up the precipitous side of a mountain only to fall into a crevasse, to go hurtling from crag to crag until it lands shapeless and inert on a pile of jagged rocks? Will, "Oh! just to be doing," suffice to mollify majestic wrath?

It all depends on what is at the top. If it be to add to the sum of the world's knowledge of the world, to find the way for a needed railroad, to study the stars above the mists, to learn of the nature of a rarified atmosphere, to do any one of a score of things that the world needs to have done, well and good; but if the purpose be a vainglorious pride, a hunger to be "played up" in the press, or even merely to satisfy a misdirected but perfectly proper instinct, in such cases such risks as every mountain climber takes with the only material body he will ever get are censurable. It is making common that which is holy, holding at a mean value the priceless gift of heaven. And so it is with whatever places life in jeopardy, whether it be aviating, auto-racing, shooting whirlpools, or what not. To do such things merely that a gaping crowd may say "ah-ah-ah-ah!" to make a thrill of sensation course along so many spinal cords, is monstrous. It all depends on what is at the top!

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Records Made by the Wireless

A year ago last summer the United States battleship Tennessee picked up a wireless message from San Francisco when on the Pacific at a distance of 4580 miles from this city. At that time this was the best record which had been made in the transmission of a message without wires, but the record did not stand long, for in November of that year the steamship Korea received a message from the San Francisco station at a distance of 4720 miles over the Pacific. Only ten or eleven months have gone since then, and again the record is raised, this time by the receipt of messages at Buenos Ayres from Clifden, Ireland, and Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, each of these places being about 5,600 miles from Buenos Ayres. How long this record will stand no one knows, of course, but, brief as its existence is likely to be, it is something all but incomprehensible that the sound of the human voice has reached thus far. Think of it! Fifty-six hundred miles, or nearly one-fourth of the distance around the earth at the equator! Man's puny voice, which under ordinary circumstances can make itself heard no farther than the length of a few city blocks, reaches out over tremendous spaces when given wings by his intellect! And this by unseen agencies the potentiality of which was as unknown to us but a few decades ago as it was to our ancestors, the men of the caves! The world of men is moving, and it is moving so rapidly that we, who have our little part in its shifting scenes, but imperfectly realize how stupendous is the miracle of intellect on which we look.

Why His Nobs Will Not Visit Us

The German crown prince will leave Berlin for a visit to the Orient next month. He would much like to continue his tour to the United States, but, alas! he feels that he cannot. It appears, too, that ours is the fault, and so be ours the bitter expiation of pulling along without him. Following are the shameful circumstances which caused the blow to fall: Long years ago the crown prince's uncle, Prince Henry of Prussia, visited this country, as American devotees of codfish will happily recall. At that time Prince Henry was treated with the utmost kindness and cordiality, as he gratefully admits, but he also was "subjected to well-meant familiarities which go against the grain of even the most democratic of princes," as an European correspondent scathingly states the case. Do you see—do you realize—the awful mistake that we made? In our crude, American way we took it for granted that a prince is just a man, like the rest of us. We did not appreciate that he is hedged about by a diviner atmosphere than we inhale, and as likely as not some lantern-jawed clodhopper addressed him as "Hey, Henry!" instead of as "Revered, triply-adored and aluminum-plated Son of a Royal Accident, hail, all hail!" For this we deserve what we are going to get. The slant-eyed and pig-tailed Mongolians will reverently gaze upon the Princely Presence and wonder how it happened, while we will not gaze a gaze—no, not one! Well, we may as well take our medicine. We ordered it.

The Kinetophone Soon Will Be Here

The kinetophone, Thomas A. Edison's latest invention, is nearly perfected, and it will not be long until it will be granted to all of us to look upon and appreciate the wonder of it—for a price. The last clause is volunteered, for it is a practical certainty that this invention eventually will be the feature of all moving picture shows. In the kinetophone Mr. Edison has combined the automatic movements of the photograph and the phonograph. The result is a moving picture in which the characters apparently speak, as would the actors in a real drama. Moreover, the accompanying sound will be heard with every movement. For instance, if an actor should drop a vessel, its crash upon the floor directly will be heard. There seems to be no limit to the public's capacity for enjoying moving pictures, but when they also talk that enjoyment certainly will be greatly increased. At present the invention is not quite perfected, but it is announced that it is so nearly so that it will be in use within a few weeks.

Lloyd-George on Universal Peace

An interview with Mr. Lloyd-George, the British chancellor of the exchequer, is worthy of more attention than has been given to it on this side of the water. We quote from it:

"We cannot disarm in the midst of an armed camp. Any remedy must be international, and we are not merely willing but eagerly anxious for an international agreement by which we could arrest this headlong race to destruction. But when we have piped to other nations they would not dance to our music. Nay, they have even misconstrued our invitation to cover an insidious design to balk their legitimate desire for self-protection or as an intimation that the pace was getting too hot for us and that they had only to keep on to see us drop out of the race. This naturally makes us chary of making new overtures for any international agreement on the subject of armaments. And until such an arrangement is arrived at we have no option but to go on sadly but with unflinching resolution to maintain the comparative preponderance of naval strength which for a hundred years has been recognized by friend and foe alike as the irreducible minimum of our national security."

Regretfully, as we should, but surely, as we must, we are compelled to recognize the force of Lloyd-George's argument. Universal peace is greatly to be desired, but it must remain an unattainable dream until all nations together are wholly ready to lay down their swords and beat them into plowshares.

When Middle Names Were Not

The man who rejoices in the name of Augustus Adolphus Maurice Lorenzo Fitzjames Fitzally Jones-Smythe—not to mention his feminine mate—will be pained, and perhaps surprised, to learn that not long ago, as runs the history of nations, even one middle name was forbidden by law. One given name and one family name was considered sufficient then. Coke says, "A man cannot have two names of baptism," and Coke was considered remarkably good authority in his day. But a century and a half ago middle names were extremely uncommon, and even a century ago they still were rare. Note the fact that but three of the 56 signers of the Declaration of Independence had middle names, and this proportion probably would fairly represent the average among the men of that time. The first five Presidents of the United States had only one given name each. It is comparatively recently that we have taken to giving our children anywhere from two to four Christian names apiece.

Unfortunate Results of Civilization

We are so accustomed to look gratefully upon the beneficial results of civilization that we are inclined to forget those evils which really are of minor comparative importance. Yet that there are such evils cannot be denied. For example, there are diseases and accidents which are peculiar to civilization. The British Medical Journal enumerates some of these, and here is the list which it gives: Poisoning caused by the fumes of acetylene; dyspepsia and heart failure due to the use of aniline dyes; the caisson disease which is peculiar to workers beneath water levels; telegraphers' cramp which results from the use of the Morse key; the numerous affections due to inhaling the dust of factories; electrocution. Most of these diseases are confined to the workers in certain lines of labor, and hence cannot be considered general in their nature, but the sum total of the injury they work to humanity is far from slight, and this injury, in every instance, is of a nature of which the uncivilized know nothing; they are the diseases and hurts of civilization which are far more than compensated by multifold blessings.

The High Heel Once More Attacked

The high-heeled shoe which madame considers an essential part of her ethereal beauty has been attacked by anatomists often enough in the past, but it is never too late to take a critical shot at it. The latest expert marksman thus to identify himself with the foes of self-beautifying (?) womankind is Dr. von Koranyi, of Budapest. He says that many statistics compiled by him have convinced him that the wearing of high heels causes an increase in the lumbar curve (which may account for the wearing of such heels by women), and this entails a displacement of the kidney, even if that organ otherwise were of a retiring disposition. So here again is the testimony of an expert; but will our sisters wear any less high heels on that account? Well, hardly! The kind who read of Dr. Koranyi's views are not those who wear high heels.

PIE

Ray McIntyre King

Three times three hundred and sixty-five pies each year—that was the number my mother baked. We had one pie for dinner, one for supper, and the third one for breakfast next morning, provided my father didn't surreptitiously finish it and his book at midnight. He was one generation come out of England where the pies are pastry covered meat and gravy affairs and a far call from our delectable native product. If he had been of American extraction, say of the 4th, or 6th, or 7th power—I mean generation—only pure mathematics can determine how many more than one thousand and ninety-five pies he might have consumed annually. As it was, no naturalization reformer can say that he did not adopt and appreciate fully our greatest and most uniquely American institution—Pie.

That was in Kansas and all our neighbors ate pies. They did it from principle, because they were from Lucy-Larcom-and-Whittier-inspired ancestry, come out of pie-eating New England to build the "homestead of the free"; but my father liked pie, not because of tradition, nor association, nor abolition sentiment, but just because—it was Pie!

As I said, all our neighbors, all the town, in fact, the whole state of Kansas, ate pie in those days. Perhaps they still do. Perhaps that is why Kansas is still so sound and sensible. What do you make pies of? was the absorbing theme at all feminine gatherings. The woman with an answer to that question had the floor. Fruit was scarce and it was a public benefaction when Mrs. Vince Brown discovered that stewed green tomatoes flavored with lemon make boss pie-filling. In extremity, the housewife could always fall back on vinegar pie, which, if you please, is very good—better than no pie.

Which demonstrates that, after all, the filling doesn't count, provided you make it thin enough. It is the crust that makes or mars the pie. Any old thing for the filling, but the crust—the crust! Beware how ye handle! Let no unholy, non-Puritan fingers meddle in that part of the pie! It takes the seventh daughter of the seventh daughter of the American Revolution to make a pie crust that melts in the mouth, a dainty flake of paste that dissolves ere the tongue senses its weight.

A German hausfrau, an immigrant, told me with tears of chagrin of her tragic attempt at pie making. She studied the situation both in cook books and American kitchens. Finally she made a pie, but it wasn't pie and never would be pie in that family before her granddaughter's time.

Yes sir! Like a number of other good and bad things the pie is of New England origin. "On the bleak New England shore," with fresh meat scarce, the resourceful cook began to substitute wild berries and fruits for the meat of the Old England pie of savory memory. When in seasons of festivity, she essayed a meat pie, it became by gradual process of economic reduction, a mince pie, a frugal mixture of meat and fruit. The harsh climatic and harsher social conditions of New England

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE

A writer in a recent issue of the Atlantic Monthly very aptly called attention to the fact that science is playing strange havoc with our ideals of education, threatening to obliterate classical studies from the curricula of our schools and colleges. He called attention also to the fact that, while science is useful and while it informs us as to the things of the world, it touches the spirit of man not at all. That if a man would know anything about his soul, if he would seek to make it expand and grow, he must certainly return to the Scriptures of the Jews and the tragedies of the Greeks and to the later poets and dramatists whose work is founded on these.

Incidentally this writer touched in passing on a matter of vital concern to literature. He pointed out that modern science is inventing a new language, a wierd hybrid tongue, to all save its devotees a meaningless jargon, and that modern writers more and more are coming to think in terms of this new language and attempting to interpret life in those terms. It is upon this phase of his article that we wish to dwell.

This phenomenon recalls the saying of Jesus, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's." This is the axiom that too many modern writers are trying to override. They are attempting to express the things of the spirit, the poetry of the soul, in the terms of a tentative scientific jargon. As well attempt to express them in the terms of algebra or of geometry. As well attempt to interpret the Song of Songs into logarithms, or Romeo's apostrophe to Juliet into a chemical formula. The two matters simply do not mix. They belong to different categories. Science presumes to assert that the other category is negligible. The human heart protests. Our modern Merediths may write a million novels to declare that emotion is a snare and sentiment a false guide and that reason is the only lamp to guide us, but they cannot demolish emotion and sentiment nor, we fear, adequately define reason.

In this column last week the present writer spoke of the moralizing and reforming spirit that had crept into English letters, muddying the clear stream of its inspiration. He should add here the scientific spirit that has more recently been added to the polluting mass. We read only yesterday, in the Chautauquan (how admirably the name suggests its pale dilution of "culture") an advertisement of a "novel," forsooth, that purports to explain the "law of eugenics" in the course of its pleasing narrative. Let us have next a "novel" on the fourth dimension, written in the terminology of calculus.

The emotional life exists, the realm of sensation is impregnable. The mystery of life haunts us, and science throws no light upon it. When we have unearthed all ancient ruins, have analyzed the outmost star, have reduced matter to its lowest chemical terms, when every "fact" of Nature is known and tabulated, we shall know no more of that mystery than the babe that croons from its cradle. We shall then still have with us the wonderful miracle of love, we shall still know "doubt, hesitation and pain," the human heart will still aspire to God and the spirit brood upon the mystery of the infinite. The source of life will still be an unsolved riddle, the end of life an impenetrable veil. We shall still need those resources of fortitude, hope and faith. We shall still crave the alleviating balm of love.

What has science to do with these? Nothing. They are the province of the poet, of the painter, of the sculptor, of the dramatist, of the religious devotee. And they are their only province. Science does not speak their language, does not pursue their ends. And it is a fallacy of an hour by which writers are deceived, to suppose that literature can adapt the language and the functions of material science to the expression of the broodings of the heart.

PERSONALIA

Mr. Richard Watson Gilder's "Grover Cleveland: A Record of Friendship," his last published work, will be issued in book form this fall. The book is based on the articles which appeared in the Century in 1909; and will have a number of full-page illustrations from photographs.

Helen Keller's poem, "The Song of the Stone Wall," will be published by the Century company in October, in a charming volume, every page decorated with a border, and with eight full-page reproductions from photographs of the author and the stone wall.

The Century company is making Robert Hichens' description of "The Holy Land" into a book, with many full-page pictures in the colors of the paintings by Jules Guerin, and with forty full-page half-tone reproductions of carefully chosen photographs. The volume will be issued in late October.

Robert Barr, best known as the author of "Cardillac," published last year, and "Tekla," a romance issued some years ago, has returned to the scene of his early success for a novel which he will issue this fall through Frederick A. Stokes company. "The Sword Maker" is laid in the Rhine region of Germany at the time of the great robber barons and, as in "Tekla," Mr. Barr has made it a story of action rather than description.

"The Merry Wives of Windsor" will be the first production of the regular repertoire company at the New theatre in New York. The production, with Edith Wynne Matthison, in the cast, will be made November 7.

Margaret Anglin's new comedy, in which she will appear under the management of the Liebler firm, is by a woman with the pseudonym of George Egerton. The comedy is called "The Backsliders," and will come to production on Christmas day.

TOLSTOY AND LITERATURE

"I hate literature," said Tolstoy recently. "Why do people write? Why does everybody write? Only a select few, the very giants of intellect alone, should be permitted to write, and then they should write the truth."

"Art in literature? There is no such thing. It is only a question of money and talent. For the sake of these two authors write and artists work."

"Money is the poison of literature. Everybody wants to make a living by writing. They prostitute themselves and barter their souls away."

LITTLE SOLDIER

By Grace Hibbard

I hold my little soldier's hat
With fond, caressing hand;
I smooth the nodding feather out,
And then the twisted band.

He ever was a "soldier boy,"
A "Captain" in his play;
The pretty toy—his fallen sword—
I cannot hide away.

Defying Time—the enemy—
That heals the wounded heart,
His tiny cannon aimless stands
From other toys apart.

Outside, upon the lilac bush,
His plaything flag I see;
A storm has dimmed its colors bright,
As life is dimmed for me.

SHAW'S WORKS BY THE POUND

English authors have been stirred up by a discussion of the question, What is the proper length of a novel? They resent the implied suggestion that their work should be measured with a yardstick. George Bernard Shaw humorously disposes of his share in the discussion with assurances that his future works will be offered for sale by the pound. He says:

"In my opinion fiction should be sold by the pound, as blue books are. I attribute a good deal of the steadiness of my own market to the fact that I have always thoroughly understood that people have to lay in a household store of reading, just as they have to lay in a household store of tea or cheese, and that they expect four-and-sixpence worth of it to last a certain time.

"I should like to take this opportunity of informing my customers that my next volume will contain three complete plays and three prefaces comparable to royal commission reports on subjects of universal interest. It will keep an average man of business in active reading for a fortnight and will last the family fully a month, and it will bear reading over again once every eighteen months for life.

"This estimate does not include reading in bed, but it will be found under rather than over the mark with fair reading. You save money by buying my books. Books are like boots; it only they are readable and fit comfortably, those which last longest are the best. Mr. Heinemann was the first publisher to grasp this fact, though it had long been familiar to every man of moderate means with a houseful of daughters all clamoring for something to read. Hence the 100,000 word novel."

THE MOURNFULLEST OF BALLADS

Mrs. Rose Figue, of Flatbush, L. I., recently wrote to the editor of the New York Sun the following letter, enclosing the correct words of a famous old English humorous ballad: Having read so many incorrect copies of that famous and humorously tragic old ballad of the maid and her lover in The Sun, thought I would send you the correct version, sung to the tune of "Vilkins and His Dinah," another very old English ballad, and sung by the late Johnny Toole, the English comedian. Many a time have I amused the little folks by singing this quaint old song:

A long time to come ago, I reccomember it well,

In a beautiful damsel a village did dwell,
Alone with her parients, she lived all serene,
And her age it was red and her hair was nineteen.

Now this maid had a lover who close by did dwell,

A bandy backed rustic, humped legged as well;
Said he, fly with me by the light of yon star,
For you are the eye of my apple, you are.

But this dutiful maiden said gently, be wise,
My father would scratch out my nails with his eyes.

If you love me you'll go right away from this place,
Sobbed the maid, as she buried her hands in her face.

Now, as she refused him, he seized the poor maid,
And silently opened the knife of his blade.
If you don't fly with me and become my dear wife,
I'm resolved with my throat, that I will cut your knife.

Her father came by just then, it appears,
And saw his dear daughter with eyes in her tears.

He raised her fair form and her pale lips he kissed,
Then he rushed with his nose on that murderer's fist.

Now when that murderer saw what he did,
He strangled himself on a saucepan lid,
To commit susantide, his way he did wend,
And this is the tale of a very sad end

MEMORIES OF '49

RECALLED BY ONE OF THE FIRST ARRIVALS IN THE GOLD RUSH

Away up on the top floor of the Lumbermen's building, at 110 California street, sits a keen-eyed man who has turned 83 years of age—and looks only 65 of them—who gazes out the window over the San Francisco of today and recalls with minute precision the San Francisco of sixty-one years ago, streets, stores, men and institutions. This is Mr. William H. Pratt, one of the port wardens of San Francisco.

On December 22, 1848, Mr. Pratt boarded the steamer Orus in New York, bound for the Isthmus of Panama, on his way to California. News of the discovery of gold had just reached the East, and the first pioneers of the gold rush were making their way westward. The Orus was a little side-wheel steamer, built for travel in the quiet waters of Long Island Sound and East River, and totally unfit for travel on the high seas. But every available water craft was impressed for the Panama service that winter, and the Orus was outfitted for a cruise to the Chagres river on the east coast of Panama. Sixty-eight men bought tickets at $100 apiece for the voyage on her. But when sailing day came and the men inspected the little tub, all but fourteen refused to hazard their lives in her. Mr. Pratt was one of the fourteen.

Anyone who knows the Atlantic coast knows what Cape Hatteras is in winter, a dangerous coast, subject to violent storms. The Orus encountered one of the worst of these, and had to put back into Norfolk to pump out and repair leaks. Another attempt was made to round the cape. Mr. Pratt was called out of bed very early that morning, to join all hands at the pumps. A terrific sea was running and the wind was blowing a gale. Every moment the passengers expected the boat would go down. In a moment's lull one of them called to the captain:

"Do you think we'll ever make it?"

And that old sea-dog's grim reply was:

"We'll make hell or Charleston by six o'clock."

They made Charleston, fortunately. From there they sailed to Nassau, in the Bahamas, and thence across the Caribbean to the coast of Panama. So little was known in those days of that coast that the captain of the Orus actually sailed by the mouth of the Chagres River three times before he identified it as the place he was headed for. At length the landing was made; fortunately the steamer from Panama for San Francisco was in port on the other side of the Isthmus and Mr. Pratt caught it. This steamer, the old California, had accommodations for thirty-five first class and fifty steerage passengers, but she made that run with 650 passengers, safely reaching the Golden Gate on the last day of February, 1849, the first steamer that ever entered the bay of San Francisco. Mr. Pratt is one of the four surviving passengers of that list of 650 that came on the California on her first trip.

The San Francisco that Mr. Pratt entered exists now only in the recollection of a few old men and in the pages of history. The town clustered about Portsmouth Square, where there were two adobe buildings—the town hall and another—and a few stores. The waters of the bay came up to Montgomery street at the foot of Clay, and to Sansome at the foot of Sacramento, and to the base of Telegraph Hill to the north. There were no dwellings as far south as California street.

Mr. Pratt and a friend pitched a tent at a point about where Second street now is, between Mission and Howard. This was then waterfront, a little cove in the beach. The present site of the Palace Hotel and of the Call building was a high hill of sand.

Mr. Pratt consulted returned miners and found advocates of two gold fields. Some claimed that the "Stanislaus mines," in Tuolumne and neighboring counties were the richer prospects, but the majority opinion favored Coloma, on the south fork of the American river, in El Dorado county. Mr. Pratt and his partner decided to try the Coloma country and bought passage on a boat to Sutter's Fort, paying $50 for the trip and boarding themselves. They sailed from San Francisco on a rainy, rough day early in March. The bay was so rough that nearly all the passengers were seasick, and the captain was forced to seek shelter from the wind by anchoring overnight near Point Richmond. The next day the journey was resumed, and the following morning the party woke up to find themselves stranded high and dry in Suisun bay. In all, the trip to the present site of Sacramento consumed nine and a half days. It now takes twelve hours. The fare was $50, half of the amount Mr. Pratt had paid from New York to Panama, and more than sufficient now for a fare to Kansas City. Sacramento, by the way, did not then exist. Its site was called Embarcadero, and consisted of a small cluster of tents.

Mr. Pratt and his companion made their way over to Sutter's Fort. There Mr. Pratt unpacked a trunk containing knickknacks he had purchased in New York for $50. These he displayed and quickly sold for $450. The miners who bought them were mainly from Oregon, and had never seen the pretty little odds and ends of manufacture, and found them more attractive than the gold dust they had panned.

The money realized from the sale of trinkets staked Mr. Pratt into the gold country. He had brought with him a small kit of tools and the metal part of a gold rocker, but miners at the fort told him he would require a gold pan and a shovel. These he purchased at the store near the fort, paying $16 for each. Then he contracted with an ox-driver to carry his trunk and supplies to Coloma, and he and his partner walked. They made the trip in about ten days.

When he reached Coloma, Mr. Pratt proceeded to put together the parts of his gold rocker. Lumber was needed for this purpose, and fortunately an old sawmill was in operation nearby. Here he paid $6 for one plank, which he used to make his rocker. As soon as he had finished it a miner offered him twelve ounces of gold for it, but he refused to sell. The next day he and his partner staked out a claim and went to work, cleaning up $8.

In the hope of finding better diggings, he soon packed over the divide to the Middle Fork of the American, and followed that toward its source, mining as he went, until he reached Spanish Bar. His luck was reasonably good, but he decided that merchandise was a more stable asset, so he took the money he had made mining and returned to New York, reaching there Christmas day, 1850, two years and two days after he had left it. He bought a large assortment of goods and took passage again for the isthmus in the spring of '51.

Now he encountered bad luck. The trip to the isthmus was very slow, he had to wait two months in Panama for a later boat than he had expected to take, and the boat he did get at last, the Sarah Sands, was extremely slow. He took pneumonia on the voyage, and was not able to land in San Francisco until several weeks after the ship had anchored. In the meantime, however, he had employed a clerk, who landed his merchandise and opened a store on the point of land between Clay and Sacramento streets. When Mr. Pratt recovered from his illness he took charge of the store and was soon on the highroad to fortune.

Then, one morning, as he and his clerk left their boarding place after breakfast and started down to open the store, the cry of "Fire!" was heard, and in a few moments a roaring fire was sweeping the whole city. This was in June, the month of high winds, and the frame structures in the path of the flames were swept away in a few hours. Mr. Pratt's loss was almost complete.

After the fire he was able to borrow $1,000, on good security, but the interest he had to pay was ten per cent a month. In spite of this extortionate rate he was soon able to pay out of debt and have a prosperous business. He established stores and boarding houses in various parts of the state, and acquired a moderate fortune.

During this period he had occasion to be in the Mameluke Hill district, and worked a claim there. This was one of the most extraordinary gold fields in the state. The gold was found in lumps and threads of pure metal, ranging in value from 50 cents to hundreds of dollars apiece. The only place it was found was in a curious red soil, to be found only in the narrow ravines that ran down the side of the main ridge of Mameluke Hill. The gold was never found on the small ridges that separated these ravines, nor very far above the gully beds, but usually only in a narrow strip of soil, from two to six feet wide. Sometimes it was uncovered at a depth of two feet, sometimes at a depth of fifty, but nearly always just above the bed rock. Here it would be uncovered in beautiful patterns of threads of gold, a foot or two long, lying like golden lace in designs that varied from circles to intricate arabesques. Today the Mameluke Hill country is settled by farmers and the old diggings are no longer worked, but not so very long ago a farmer, ploughing in red dirt, turned up a pocket from which he took $3,000 in gold.

The civil war found Mr. Pratt in the northern counties of California, face to face with the Indian war. He joined the volunteer battalion that was organized to subdue the redmen, and for two years campaigned against them. After the Indian war was over and the Indians were rounded up on a reservation, Mr. Pratt returned to his business career. But two years later the government agent in charge of the reservation was murdered and Mr. Pratt was offered the cheerful position as his successor. In spite of the danger of the post and the chances of following the former agent into oblivion, Mr. Pratt accepted and administered the position for two years. His later career was full of vicissitudes and interesting events, but they are not germane to the subject of the Days of Gold.

("Pie"—Concluded)

have thus set their mark indubitably on the American pie. The fat-bellied meat pies of Old England, when transplanted to the inhospitable shores of the New World, became thinner and thinner and flatter and flatter till today we have it a thin depressed disk of pastry encasing something—fruit, mince meat, custard, or whatnot culinary hybrid. That, sir, is the evolution of our great American Pie, and it ought to be a matter of national pride, sir, that we can trace its history back to the very foundations of our other free institutions!

I was about to remark (before I soared) that no process of elimination, substitution, reduction, or miserliness, has ever destroyed the toothsome of the crust. No matter what the change in size and content, the crust has improved in texture in direct ratio.

Pie has enriched philology and added to the common stock of our expressive American tongue. Take the word "pie-faced." When a rural belle hurls that epithet at her rival she has uttered the uttermost unapprobative word in our vocabulary. "Public pie," "pie counter," political terms meaning "To the victors belong the spoils." "Pie biter," a gourmand, an epicure, having its origin in those pie-eating contests, which, together with sack, tub and potato races, and greased pole climbing enlivened the Fourth of July celebrations of the last century. Thus, sir, is pie indissolubly linked with Patriotism.

That tragic line of demarcation, the Mason and Dixon, separated the pies of the South eternally from the pies of the North. The Aunt Dinahs, who cooked by inspiration and not by rule nor recipe, made a pie that for richness and amplitude might well symbolize the generous hospitality of the Old South. They called it a "cobbler," and it attained its perihelion in the "peach cobbler" of antebellum days. That was a pie with depth and breadth and four corners where the peach caramel oozed up over the fluffy crust. You ate it with clotted cream—one, two, three helpings—and it was nectar and ambrosia, fit food for the very Gods!

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

He Is a Dreamer

He is a dreamer. Though his eyes
See dimly, yet in part they see
The grace divine, the harmony,
The Hand hath set 'neath star-gemmed skies;
See tides eterne that ebb and flow—
He is a dreamer; let him go.

He is a dreamer. Sometimes he Doth fancy that a voice he hears,
A voice unheard by mortal ears,
Which whispers: "I am leading thee;
My angels note thine earthly lot."—
He is a dreamer; heed him not.

He is a dreamer. Lo, the call
Of voices ringing through the night:
"Howe'er it seem, all shall be right,
For love, dear love, doth lead us all.
So runs creation's changeless creed."—
He is a dreamer; do not heed.

He is a dreamer. Though the gold
That somewhat buys he e'er doth miss,
He knows that it is more than this
A hand of love in love to hold;
So walks content while love is nigh—
He is a dreamer; pass him by.

He is a dreamer. Thou, my God,
Though I must walk a lowly way
Deep hidden from the light of day,
Yet, full content, my path I'll plod
While dreams from Thee do bless my lot—
I am a dreamer; heed me not.

The Automobile and Life

Take an automobile, for example.
It is your automobile, for the financier whom you visited admitted that the mortgage on your house and lot would be all right, and you preferred to pay for it in that way rather than by monthly installments which would be almost as large as your salary. Yes, the automobile is yours, and you and Laura will take your first ride in it. Ah, such a ride as it will be! You will go speeding away into the cool, green reaches of the beautiful country places.
The lowing kine, chewing the contemplative cud, will look placidly upon you as you whirl past them; the frisky lambs will skip as you pass them by; the sagacious hens will try to fly into the next county; gentle zephyrs will kiss your city-fevered brow and soothe you.
Oh, it will be great!

At last you and Laura (or it is Laura and you in many families) start. You see the cows, the lambs, the hens, everything as per schedule, and the zephyrs fan you, as advertised. Then, at 15 or 20 miles out, something happens to the geewhiz, or the thingumbob, or something or other, and you get out to fix it, while Laura stands around and tells you how to do it, as women do. Alas! notwithstanding Laura's directions, it will not fix, for you are new at the business, and lack expert knowledge. Finally, after you have worn out your clothing, your temper, and your vocabulary, you give it up, and hire a farmer to take Laura and you into town and to drag the auto in that evening. It is tough, but there is nothing else to do.

And such is the world in which we live, son.
We start out in the morning, and all life is our own automobile. It is our automobile, mark you, and we propose to do as we like with it.
We will run it as far as we please at such gait as we please, and we will have the bulliest kind of a bully time, as one of our ex-Presidents would remark. So we start out, about the gayest young thing that ever came down the pike, and all goes swimmingly until—presto!
bang!—something breaks, and, after much wasted effort, we conclude to walk for a while.
The world's great automobile is ours, but it requires an expert to run it without breakage, and the truth is pounded home to us that we are not experts.

If you wish to run the big automobile successfully, son, you must learn how. You can't do it on youthful confidence alone, though that is a good thing to have.

The Opinions of Rufus

Seems to me that our errors ought to be the same es seed that's sown to spring up in a crop of tender sympathy fer others that err.

Jest es a solemn warnin', son, you'd better take notice that the hoss that always hangs back is the one that gits the heft of the whippin'.

Some folks' religion reminds me of Deacon Starkweather's clock. He said he'd figgered it out that the blamed thing could be relied on to run jest 'bout one day in the week.

If you ain't wise make a solemn pretense that you are, an' the chances are that most people never 'll find out the difference.

Science sometimes teaches us too much.
F'rinstance, 'bout all the comfort they was in havin' boils was taken 'way when the doctors announced there was nothin' in the theory that they prevent a run o' fever.

If some 'rangement could be made fer washin' a feller's reputashum es easy es he can his hands 'twould be quite a relief to some of us.

Truth's like the north star—a guide unto our feet. Trouble is lots of us don't know how to find it.

An' again it's like the north star: It's there even if we don't find it.

I never could understand why the man or woman that thinks the least so frequently has the most to say 'bout it.

The best part of quite a number of men I know is their wives.

Variety's the spice of life, but if you try to make a hull meal on spice you're likely to git dyspepsy.

I don't approve of lots of Satan's habits, but I can't help acknowledgin' that he must be energetic.

Josh Bings says every man ought to remember that a four-flush that's played right is better than a full hand that's played wrong.

I don't believe a knave is so dangerous es a dratted fool. You can figger easier on the proceedin's of the first.

Wanted: A Place

(As sadly announced by ex-King Manuel)

Wanted: A place, a position, in fact,
By an heir to a kingly line.
Though his spirit is dwarfed, and his thinker is cracked,

Yet his right as a monarch's divine.
Wanted: A throne that is not out of date,
And a scepter unscratched by the mob, (With a room close at hand for an ardent soul-mate)

By a king who is out of a job.

Wanted: Some sense that is tested and tried,
Or receipt for insuring a crop
Of brains where they're needed, the caput inside,

Instead of a crown on its top.
Wanted: Nephenthe for ending the woe
That's told in a howl and a sob,
(And a ticket to go where affinities go)
By a king who is out of a job.

For sale (in event that no job is at hand):
A throne that is slightly shopworn,
Some fires that the hand of rebellion has fanned,

And a scepter of jewelry shorn.
For sale: Divine Right, somewhat fractured and marred,

Having been tossed about by the mob,
(Reserving a soul-mate in vaudeville starred)
By a king who is out of a job.

Application of the Rule

Her mother—Why are you crying, Ellen?
Young wife—Jo-John said we must ma-make the best of everything.

"Well, that was nice. I don't see why you should feel sad."

"Ye-es, but after he seh-said it he went fishing and used the bi-biscuits I made fo-fo for sinkers."

The Shekel-Grabbing Clan

The fundamental doctrine of the Shekel-
Grabbing Clan

Is, The number of his dollars is the measure of a man;

And the members always whisper, by a brother's death bereft,

"Isn't this a sad occasion!—Can you tell me what he left?"

For, though they're "leading citizens,"—so papers say, at least—

They always leave their treasure where they're mentioned as "deceased."

Though a member's mind is wobbly, and his soul is but a bluff,

Says the Clan, "Tis not important if his 'roll' is big enough."

The mottoes of the members of the Shekel-
Grabbing Clan:

"The man first makes the Dollars, then the Dollars make the man!"

"Let not your hearing be too keen to note the sob of woe,

Lest in your foolish tenderness you let your ducats go;"

"Please don't condemn the Jews who bowed unto the Golden Calf!"

"If you cannot seize a dollar, do not fail to grab a half."

"If you opine such mottoes prove their natures
callous, tough,

It really does not matter if their "rolls" are big enough.

I haste to pay my tribute to the Shekel-
Grabbing Clan;

And if I do, what do I more than nearly every man?

For they are "leading citizens," as all of us agree,

And the Law is pleased to aid them with a technicality;

They orate on state occasions, though their minds be like a blank—

Why should we ask for intellect? They've money in the bank!

Oh, yes, they're "leading citizens," and all that kind of guff,

And the proof cannot be doubted, for their
"rolls" are big enough.

Thoughtful Man on Carrying Water

"I notice," said the Thoughtful Man, "that a certain part of the state press is heroically supporting the candidacy of Judge Lawlor on principle and the candidacy of Judge Melvin just for luck, and although considerably warped and strained in doing so, the papers do not hesitate on that account. 'Tis fine, 'tis noble! and it is man's privilege to indorse both St. John and Beelzebub. You will find this golden truth stated on page 69 of 'Simple Rules for Carrying Water on Both Shoulders, or, How to Love Them Both,' which was compiled by Abraham Ruef, Doctor of Laws, in spare moments that he found when too sick to be in jail.

"When Big Interest was all but paralyzed in San Francisco, and it was widely feared that Justice would interfere with buying franchises from poor and willing supervisors, Judge Lawlor, as is well known, attempted to maintain the exploded theory that Justice should be for every man regardless of his wealth, and, side by side with him in advocating this pernicious dogma, was Francis J. Heney, whose name I blush to mention, having owned a few supervisors myself in my time. Then it was, at this time of Boodle's need, that the noble Melvin, out of respect for himself and his good right hand, which had been manicured, refused to shake hands with Heney.

"And they are supporting both of them! I suppose that they confess after doing the one or the other; and it is fervently trusted that the father confessor exudes grace enough to see them safely through the campaign. And some of these papers claim that they are standing on principle! They are—with one foot. As for the other foot—but don't you think it is best not to inquire too closely?"

"Probably," said I. "There is such a thing as a foot being too muddy for inspection."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

It Is Time the Voter Made Out His Ticket

What The Watchman will not do himself he will not advise any other voter to do with reference to the ticket he shall vote and, per contra, what The Watchman expects to do himself he has no hesitancy in advising other voters to do. It is time for us to make up our tickets as we expect to vote them and get the matter off our minds or, at least, get the matter so well settled as to make it unnecessary to reopen the case unless on the discovery of new evidence. With this purpose in view, and the reader's consent, The Watchman will hit the high places in the two main tickets that we may all of us find "where we are at."

Johnson or Bell, Which and Why?

California is fortunate in having two such fine men up to select from. Had the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau been managing, as formerly, neither Johnson nor Bell could have been nominated and the choice would have been between two evils and not between two such good men.

Nevertheless, there is a difference. Epitomized that difference is this: Theodore Bell has splendid, honorable, praiseworthy ambitions for himself, Hiram Johnson for his state; Bell is splendidly politic, considerate and tactful, Johnson is rash in relation to his antagonisms and says at every meeting things that make the hair of old politicians stand on end. Bell knows without being told that there is only one place in the world where he can get the votes necessary to make him governor and that is from the ranks of "organization" Republicans, whom Johnson so signally defeated at the primaries, and nothing can force Mr. Bell to biff these "standpat" Republicans in the eye or smite them on the other cheek. If he gets elected he will remember those by whom he was elected, not to do anything dishonorable, but to make things as easy for them as he consistently can. Mr. Johnson is helping Mr. Bell to get and hold that element in the Republican party by standing, after the nomination, for exactly what he stood for before the primary election and, if he wins in the election, it will be with the aid of progressive Democratic votes. In spite of himself, Theodore Bell is the conservative candidate in this campaign. By logic of the situation, by temperament, by choice, by a splendid enthusiasm for his state, Hiram Johnson is the progressive candidate. Not since Starr King has California witnessed such a campaign as he is making and, not since Starr King's time, has there been such need for just such a man to perform just such a service. Fine men, Bell and Johnson, honorable to the state that produced them, but Hiram Johnson is, nevertheless, the man of the hour, the man who maintains a similar relation to this commonwealth that Theodore Roosevelt does to the nation, a man who forgets self in his zeal for his cause. The Watchman expects to vote for Hiram Johnson unless some act of God or the public enemy stands betwixt him and the polls on election day and, without the smallest qualm of conscience, he unhesitatingly advises all other voters to go and do likewise.

Wallace or Spellacy

Timothy Spellacy is a jolly good fellow, popular, genial, companionable, financially honest. He is a politician and will use all the arts of politics to gain his election. In connection with his candidacy is a deep undertone that is disquieting. Every man in the state to whom word can be "passed down the line" will vote for Tim Spellacy for lieutenant governor. If elected he will have the making up of the senate committees and whoever makes up those committees can make trouble for both a Republican legislature and a Republican governor. A Republican legislature is mathematically inevitable and a Republican governor is almost as certain. Then why Tim Spellacy? There is no good reason except that he wants the office, and that the interests that are antagonistic to Hiram Johnson's election, and will be to his administration, want Spellacy elected. That is reason enough why he should not be.

Albert J. Wallace is not a "good fellow" in the ordinary acceptance of the term. He is neither a good politician nor a good mixer and glad-hander; but he is a solid, honest, sound, painstaking and sagacious gentleman who, by dint of patient and persistent effort, has become well-to-do, ready upon his feet, clear of head and strong of mind, resolute to do what is right and to resist what is wrong. If there be any reason, save one, why anyone who votes for Bell should not vote for Spellacy The Watchman does not know it. That one reason is that the saloons are for Spellacy and whoever is against the saloons should be against Spellacy. If there be any reason why anyone who intends to vote for Johnson should not vote for Wallace, The Watchman does not know that either. On the contrary, there is every conceivable reason why the election of Johnson should be made good by the election of A. J. Wallace to the second office.

Two Places to Fill On the Supreme Bench

The people of California are distrustful of their supreme court. The fear is that three of the seven justices are not wholly unmindful at critical junctures of the political powers that made them justices, and that one or two of the others may be afflicted with such an overweening regard for the forms of the law as to blind them to the more important claims of justice. The reconstruction of the court is not easy, inasmuch as only two places are filled each four years. The people have an opportunity to fill two such places this year and will have no other for four years more. This is not to be complained of, but is a fact to be considered in making out our judicial tickets.

There is in this state one man, and only one, who has a claim upon the voters of the state for judicial preferment. Incompetency to fill the high office of supreme court justice is the only excuse which the voters of this state could, under any possible condition, plead with any fairness at all in justification for not voting for him, and that justification does not exist. On the contrary the competency of this man cannot seriously be questioned. Reference is here made to William P. Lawlor. If any public official ever earned preferment at the hands of any people this man has earned it at the hands of the people of California. He has proven himself capable of a sustained moral purpose. He has endured, in the hope and for the purpose of establishing justice, justice that looks to the man and his offense and to neither his wealth nor his political power, all the contumely and reproach that can be heaped upon a servant of the people and he has endured it without wavering and without complaining. He is able, he is honest, he is learned in the law and he is as brave and as steadfast as it is given to men to be. Whomever else any elector may vote for he should vote for W. P. Lawlor to be associate justice of the Supreme Court of California.

But there are two places to be filled. Having voted for Judge Lawlor to fill one The Watchman expects to vote for Justice M. C. Sloss to fill the other. His original preferment was not through Southern Pacific political influence. He was an appointee of former Governor Pardee. He is able, honest, a close student of the law and an industrious worker on the bench.

The election of Judge Melvin would be a mistake. He owes all the judicial or other preferment he has ever received to politics and his elevation to the place where he sits to "organization" politics. He has the reputation of being as much of a politician as judge.

Of Judge Bledsoe The Watchman knows comparatively little, but if the sectional voting at the primary election is any indication of how the voting will go at the general election he has small chance of being elected. He lacks a state reputation and without a state reputation he cannot be elected. The Watchman knows nothing against him. If his friends will vote for Judge Lawlor for one place and for Judge Bledsoe for the other it is not likely that any serious harm will be done, as Lawlor and Sloss will be elected just the same. It is in the air that they are to be.

Jordan or Bayley

Either Frank C. Jordan or S. S. Bayley will be elected Secretary of State on the 8th of November. Which shall it be? There is no chance for dodging. The Watchman is a Republican. He does not believe in bolting a party nomination without good cause. In the case of Frank Jordan there is good cause. He is not a fit man to be put into that office. He was probably the unfittest man voted for upon any ticket for any office at the August primary election. If elected it will be the duty of the legislature to legislate out of the office of Secretary of State every function that can be legislated out of it, and to restrict the rest within the narrowest limits. He will make a mess of that office if he gets into it if these things are not done. The California Weekly cannot and will not advise any man to cast a vote for Frank C. Jordan for Secretary of State. He was nominated by less than 29 per cent of the votes cast for Republican candidates for that office. The direct primary law should be so amended as to make the nomination of any candidate by so small a minority impossible if it takes a second election to do it. The vote he received about represents the percentage in the Republican voting constituency that is unfit to vote at all.

Opposed to Mr. Jordan the Democrats have nominated Mr. S. S. Bayley of Berkeley. He knows little about public business and nothing at all about politics. He is a well-to-do farmer and cattle-buyer who was put on the ticket by the Democratic powers that be in the expectation that he would "come through" with something to help along the campaign, and he consented to allow his name to be used out of sheer good nature and not any more because he wants an office than because President Taft wants an airship. But what was at the beginning a mere good natured permission to allow his name to be used to fill a gap in the ticket of his party has, by the nomination of Frank Jordan by the Republicans, become a patriotic duty. He must, if he can, Democrat though he is, save the Republican party of California from the humiliation of having made an egregious blunder and the State of California from having a wholly unfit Secretary of State. He must do all he can to be elected.

S. S. Bayley is honest. He knows men. If elected he will know how to select assistants capable of handling the work of that office even if he can not handle it himself. He is a man of sound judgment, of blameless life, and his strong common sense will save him and the state from harm. Vote for him. Everybody vote for him. Frank Jordan should receive fewer votes at the general election than he received at the primary.

Pemberton or U. S. Webb

The Watchman does not know much about J. E. Pemberton, Democratic nominee for Attorney General, but he knows a good deal about U. S. Webb, knows so much that he does not need to go farther in order to cast an intelligent vote. General Webb has made good. His earlier political affiliations were with the "organization" element in the Republican party, but there came a time when the manhood in the man compelled him to refuse to walk any longer in that company. He stood out and stood up and made such a record for independence and the square deal as commends him to all who wish to cast their votes for a tried, rather than an untried, candidate. The Watchman will vote for U. S. Webb for Attorney General and conscientiously advises others to do the same.

Kingsbury Or Nolan The situation of The Watchman in relation to the office of Surveyor General is similar to that of Attorney General. He knows little of Nolan, but a good deal about Kingsbury. William Stephen Kingsbury was also an "organization" Republican and never has been anything else, but he made his office a battleground for Right Things and won. Had such a man been in that office thirty years ago, and been kept there ever since, the California treasury would have been millions of dollars richer and the state would have been less afflicted with Bensons and Hydes. Mr. Kingsbury earned re-nomination and re-election and The Watchman will vote for him. To cast out the one man who has made a right record in the office would be state folly. The reader should see to it that Mr. Kingsbury gets his vote.

Where Party Lines May Be Followed There are candidacies in relation to which party lines may properly be followed. There may be instanced such cases as those of clerk of the supreme court and superintendent of public instruction. The Watchman knows no reason why Republicans should not vote for B. Grant Taylor for clerk or Democrats for Howard A. Blanchard, and there certainly is no reason why any Republican should not vote for Mr. Taylor. He is entirely capable, honest and industrious. He will make good.

Nor is there any reason why any Republican, anxious for the well-being of our splendid educational system, should not vote for Mr. Edward Hyatt for Superintendent of Public Instruction. He is a very capable and intelligent educator, whose influence over the schools of the state has been exceptionally good. He should receive every Republican vote, and will receive the votes of many Democrats who know him and like him. This office should be filled as non-partisan as judicial positions, but where there is no reason for scratching a ticket, a ticket should not be scratched even in a judicial contest. Mr. Hyatt very well deserves to be re-elected and doubtless will be.

W. R. Williams A short time since a group of candidates for state offices were talking together, with a few others, and someone asked who the Democratic candidate for state treasurer is and only one out of fourteen persons present knew. It is a fact not necessary to be known. It is all sufficient to know that William R. Williams is running, and he is. He is state treasurer now and a better one California never had. He is clear-headed, quick-witted, honest, attentive, and he is as courageous, morally and politically, as any man in public life in this state. Notwithstanding his early espousal of the Lincoln-Roosevelt cause and steadfast advocacy of it no "organization" Republican cared to contest his nomination and it is a courageous Democrat who will seriously contest his election. There is not a stronger man on the Republican ticket.

Shannon or Ravenscroft The State Printing office is a big business plant. Its purpose is to do the state's printing and the state has a great deal of printing to be done. There is no reason in the nature of things why the state's printing should cost the state more for each article printed than the printing of any merchant or professional man costs him in the open market. In fact, it should cost less, for there is no deterioration of plant to figure off and be covered in the prices charged, no interest on borrowed capital, no taxes, no interest on the investment, no bad debts, no expense of drumming up trade. And yet the state's printing costs it from one-half more to twice as much as other persons pay in the open market, and that this is so is largely due to a lack of business acumen and backbone on the part of the State Printer. Mr. W. W. Shannon has held the office for nearly eight years and he has not remedied this condition. He has not made good. He is the Republican nominee for re-election, by virtue of having received about thirty per cent of the total vote cast for all Republican candidates for that office. He should not be re-elected. It is not good business sense to try him again.

The Democratic candidate is Mr. D. W. Ravenscroft, a gentleman who has made a success of his own business, a man of much intelligence and high personal character, and the suggestion of The Watchman is that the people of California give him a trial. They must choose between these two men. To choose Mr. Shannon is to be resigned to four years more of the same lack of good management, to place it mildly, that California has endured in the state printing office. To elect Mr. Ravenscroft is to take a chance, the only chance there is, to improve conditions in that very important office. Printing books and letter heads, envelopes and biennial reports, is business, not politics, and why not treat the issue from a business standpoint?

The Unfitness Of William Kent Mr. I. G. Zumwalt, Democratic candidate for congress from the second district, is thoroughly convinced that Mr. William Kent, the Republican candidate, is wholly unfit to represent that district in congress, and for the following reasons, to wit, that is to say, viz.: First, by reason of having been born to affluence Mr. Kent is unconsciously unable to appreciate and sympathize with the poor man and his struggles, whereas Mr. Zumwalt, having been born poor and remained poor, knows all about it. Second, because Mr.

Kent, having interests in other states, cannot be wholly loyal to district number two as his ownest own. Third, Mr. Kent, having lived in other states, and not always in this state, cannot know his district as well as Mr. Zumwalt who has lived all his life in his own district and, we surmise, in his own township in that district. Mr. Zumwalt must be an interesting personality. His horizon must be coextensive with his hat brim. He belongs to a provincial type that better befits village school director than member of the American congress.

Mr. Kent knows more of poverty, of the struggle upward of the common man, than Mr. Zumwalt ever dreamed of in his philosophy, for the reason that Mr. Kent has made a study of the subject, and a man may learn more by studying a problem for even a year than by going mooning around staring at it for thirty-nine. Mr. Kent has probably relieved more poverty than Mr. Zumwalt ever saw and has seen more poor people than Mr. Zumwalt ever saw of all kinds, rich, poor and well-to-do, including jackrabbits and Indians not taxed.

Mr. Kent will not only represent the second district of California in the congress of the United States, but he will represent the congress of the United States in the second district of California, which Mr. Zumwalt would not be able to do. In other words, a representative in congress is something more than the representative of a congressional district. If he is fit to be there he becomes a part of the government of the United States, must legislate for all parts of it and for all concerns with which it comes into contact with the world. This Mr. Kent is fit to do for he knows the United States and the world, while Mr. Zumwalt is too evidently a provincial of narrow mind and myopic vision. Finally, it would not be surprising if Mr. Kent already knew more of the second district and its needs than Mr. Zumwalt knows now or ever will know. Time is not of the essence of that knowledge, but keenness of observation, power of imagination and the possession of a trained mind. Mr. Kent is a keen, trained and comprehending observer and before he takes his seat in congress in December 1911 he will be able to impart startling information to Mr. Zumwalt regarding the needs of his own precinct. Evidently Mr. Zumwalt has never been out of his state and hardly out of his shell.

Alton Parker The Mexicanization of the Broken Loose The Mexicanization of the United States is a bugaboo that will be hard ridden for the next few weeks, and particularly in New York. Alton B. Parker is the latest relay to mount the saddle. He prophesies that Theodore Roosevelt will renounce the presidency, but will not mean it; that he will declare that he will not be a candidate to succeed Taft with the express purpose of being such candidate. In other words, he will take his place as chief Ananias of his own Ananias club. Judge Parker is still sore from the drubbing he got six years ago and his mind is askew rather than biased. It is probable that Theodore Roosevelt will soon announce his intention not again to be a candidate for president, but if he does he will mean it and live up to it. He stood pat once before when the winking of an eye would have given him the nomination. The two-term tradition is a good one to hold to, but not through fear of the Mexicanization of the United States. That could not be done without Mexicanizing the people of the United States and that would take a thousand retrogressive years to accomplish. As leader of the Republican party of America, Theodore Roosevelt can do a greater work than as president and The Watchman is beginning to think that it is no part of the duty of a president to attempt to be such leader while president. Afterward, if he have the right stuff in him, a president may make himself very useful in the capacity of leader of his party. Our present president has not made a success of party leadership. Our former president has. Therefore, let him lead.

Confessions Of Everhart Councilman Everhart of Oakland has created a sensation.

He has declared that the public service corporations have been paying the election expenses of councilmen, including his own, and that it is against sound public policy for them to do it, which it is. There are two motives which actuate public service corporations to pay the election expenses of candidates. One is to beat a candidate who might try to cinch them, the other is to secure the election of a candidate who may help such corporation to cinch the public. The relation of a public service corporation to a modern city is one of great delicacy and difficulty. The Water company, the Traction company, yes, even the Gas company, that serve the east bay cities are in the hands of men as clean and as honorable as ever engage in public service enterprises. If these companies, or any of them, find it to their advantage to expend hundreds and perhaps thousands of dollars to elect certain councilmen, and defeat others, what are we to expect in San Francisco where the ownership is of a more doubtful character? The Watchman ventures to hope that the confession of Councilman Everhart will bring out all the facts, who paid the money to elect and why. For such a condition publicity is the best remedy.

Charley Curry Mr. Charles F. Curry is a man of great intelligence.

He can read the signs of the times as easily as the phases of the moon and it is a quick man on his feet who can "beat him to it," as they expressively express it out on the street in language which The Watchman dare not use through fear of shocking proper persons by exhibiting a lack of dignity. But Mr. Curry is entirely sincere when, in an authorized interview addressed to his own supporters, he says: "In asking those who wished to see me the nominee for governor to vote for Johnson, I do so because he fought a fair fight for the prize, because he stands absolutely pledged to free California from dangerous and unhealthy influences and because his career demonstrates absolutely his ability to conduct the high affairs of state."

No one more certainly knows the nature and power of "those dangerous and unhealthy influences" which have afflicted California in years past than Mr. Curry, for he has been a part of them. Like many another who has been a part and beneficiary of those influences, Mr. Curry has known of their dangerous quality, but has lacked the resolution to go up against them and fight them to a finish. That work was left for Mr. Johnson, and that Mr. Curry has come over to the Johnson side of that issue is a fact important to California, important to Mr. Johnson's candidacy and not unimportant to Mr. Curry. To deny to him influence is to ignore the 55,390 votes cast for him in the August primary. His accession to the cause of party freedom is heartily to be welcomed.

Nor does Mr. Curry stand alone in this. Mr. McLachlan recently expressed his long existing sympathy with the Lincoln-Roosevelt movement to free the state from corporation control, but, unfortunately, lacked the courage to come out and take a hand in the fight. Indeed, all Republicans will share Mr. Curry's view. Herrinites will not, but they were always few and despicable. It is immaterial for whom they vote or whether they vote at all or not, but every true Republican, whether he was for Johnson or against him in the primaries, is, in his heart, heartily glad that the power of the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau over the Republican party has been broken. The defection from Johnson will not be of Republican votes, but of Herrinites. Let them go their way prepared for the Devil and his angels. By that token shall ye know them.

New York's Platform The Watchman has received a first class dressing down for venturing to become jubilant over the victory of the Roosevelt element in the Republican party in New York, the point being made that the platform adopted by the Republicans of New York is essentially "stand-pat," that Roosevelt has "fallen down" and is playing into the hands of the "Morgan oligarchs" and that, "It is La Follette and not Roosevelt, whom all honest, earnest, sincere, aggressive progressives in the Republican party recognize and acknowledge as the true, the real and the rightful leader in the cause of progressive reform within the party, and if The California Weekly would be honest and fair with its readers it would admit as much." It is matter for regret that the writer of the communication is of such perennial, copious, caloric quality as to make his communications unavailable for publication, but the issue he raises deserves some consideration.

The New York Republican platform was a disappointment to progressive Republicans throughout the country for the reason that what is progressive in New York would be retrogressive in Kansas or Wisconsin. The platform was not of Mr. Roosevelt's making. It is not as pronounced as he would have made it. He had better sense than to think that he could, single handed, whip the whole Republican state convention "to a frazzle." He was quite content to whip the "old guard" and secure Republican endorsements for the direct primary. He is a man, not a god, although a godlike man, and we have no right to expect from him the impossible. The crux of the New York contest was not the platform, but the organization. The slow-coaches got the Republican platform, but the progressives got the organization. In the Democratic party in New York, per contra, the progressive element got the platform and Tammany Hall got the organization. Which would our critic rather have? Senator La Follette is out on the skirmish line of progress, a splendid fighter always on the alert. Col. Roosevelt is leading the main body of the progressive army, camping each night where La Follette broke camp in the morning. La Follette is to Roosevelt what Phil Sheridan was to Grant. Splendid men, both of them. To doubt the loyalty of either now is what it was in '64 or '65 to doubt the loyalty of Grant or Sheridan. And there were doubters then.

THE TAX-REFORM AMENDMENT

By Carl C. Plehn
Article No. 7

The first of these articles gave an outline of the amendment; the second and third discussed the evils of the present system; the fourth advanced the reasons for separation of state from local taxation; the fifth presented the reasons why the larger corporations should be taxed by the higher authority, the State; the sixth discussed the advantages of the gross earnings tax. This one will set forth the effect of the amendment on the taxation of real estate.

Many years ago when the writer of these articles was beginning his study of the tax system of this state, it was his custom whenever possible to go into the field with the assessors when they were making the roll. On one such occasion an incident occurred which stands out clear in memory. The assessor arrived at the ranch of a poor young Italian. The farm was rented, so there was no assessment to be made on the land in the name of this taxpayer; but there was a small amount of personal property to be assessed. So the assessor began his inquiries: how many work horses? how many wagons, plows, harrows, rakes, small tools? is there a buggy? how many harnesses? how many cattle? hogs? chickens? ducks? has the wife a sewing machine? how many rooms in the house are furnished? any watches? etc., etc. When the inquisition was over, the farmer's wife broke into tears to learn that there was an assessment of some $800, and that the tax amounting to $17.00 or $18.00 had to be paid at once, because it was on personal property unsecured by real estate. They had to beg for time to raise the money. It was easy to see in a case like this that the farmer gets the worst of it in matters of taxation and as easy to see why. His acres lie out in the bright sunshine and cannot be hid and the rest of his property is all tangible and visible. For years the farmers have been "kicking" about this, but their "kicks" will have no more effect than their grumblings about the weather so long as the old system is retained.

Under the new system, however, they will get considerable relief and the remedy for the remaining inequalities will lie practically in their own hands. If we select any of the counties that are given over mainly to agriculture or to horticulture we can see how the new plan will afford this relief. We may take Santa Clara, because it is large and rich and not like some of the poorer counties burdened by an inordinately high tax rate. In 1909, the total assessment of the county was $72,002,490 (only 9 per cent of this, by the way, was personal property), of this $3,990,504 was property that would be withdrawn from county taxation by the amendment. The people in this county would have saved the state tax on $68,011,986 or $247,563.62 less $52,490, which was all that the corporations paid into the county funds, leaving a clear gain of $194,973.59. Stated in another way the people of this county could have raised all the money they did raise for local purpose with a tax rate 28.6 cents lower than they paid in that year. When we consider that this was the saving in a year when the state tax rate was the lowest on record up to that time and remember that the state tax rate is normally 50 cents, it is clear that both for the present and in the long run the amendment will afford the relief to which the farmers are entitled. Taking the thirty-four counties that are mainly agricultural, we find that the saving is at the average of 20 cents per hundred dollars of assessed valuation.

City real estate will not fare quite so well, but it gets a very substantial relief. The reason for this is that the cities, although they share in the gain to the counties, have to make good for the withdrawal of city taxes on the corporations. Taking the three great city counties, Alameda, Los Angeles and San Francisco, we find that the saving in the cities is about 17 cents in tax rate. This may be assumed to represent about the average in the different cities and the amount by which the cities are overtaxed at the present time.

It appears then that one of the main purposes of the amendment will be accomplished.

Objections Answered

To the Editor of The California Weekly:

Dear Sir: The other day a farmer wrote to the editor of the Pacific Rural Press asking why, under Senate Constitutional Amendment

No. 1, the rates on the gross earnings of the corporations were not uniform. Why, he asked, should the express companies pay only two per cent when the railroads paid four? The editor sent the letter to me with a request for a reply to the "objection." I answered that the point raised was no "objection" at all, but that on the contrary the letter called

SHALL ISLAIS BASIN BE FREE?

THE FUTURE OF SAN FRANCISCO INVOLVED IN BOND ISSUE

By FRANKLIN HICHBORN

At the general election in November the people of California will decide whether the principle of conservation is to be applied to San Francisco harbor. One of the most important—and, considering its far-reaching consequences, perhaps the most important—questions to be submitted to them is the authorization of the issue of $1,000,000 harbor bonds to create a fund for the purchase of sixty-three blocks of submerged land at the mouth of Islais Channel. This property is required for harbor purposes.

Location of Channel

Islais Channel opens into India Basin, the most important inlet in San Francisco county. It is situated in the southern district of the city. Running back from it is the largest piece of level land on the peninsula. With the rapid development in the southern part of the city, this land is fast becoming the center of the city's population. South of it, in Visitation Valley, west of it in the Excelsior district and at many other points, thousands of citizens have within five years built their homes. To the south and west there is now a dense population.

Four great railroads, three of them transcontinental, will eventually have terminals in close proximity to the inlet. The Western Pacific, the Santa Fe and the Southern Pacific are unquestionably preparing to handle much of their freight from this point. The Ocean Shore Railroad, which will eventually tap the rich coast region to the south and which is now completed nearly to Santa Cruz, will also have a terminal in the vicinity of the basin.

None who are in touch with conditions in San Francisco doubt but that eventually the district in the vicinity of India Basin will be the center of great commercial and industrial activity.

Inside the Sea-Wall

The entire 63 blocks lie within the line of the San Francisco sea wall. They are at present in private hands. Much of the land is thirty feet under water and the largest ships and steamers are even now anchored there. In other words, these blocks, in private hands, provide without dredging safe anchorage for the largest ships. All admit that it is impracticable to fill in the entire sixty-three blocks. Unless the state acquire this property, therefore, this safe anchoring ground will continue in private hands.

Would Pay No Tolls

The San Francisco water front is owned by the State of California. The tolls which shipping pays here are collected by the State and for the benefit of the People of the State. But the State can not collect shipping tolls from private property. We have practical illustration of this in the fact that on the southern line of the bay where the sea wall has not yet been constructed, private interests have established wharves on private land and the state is unable to collect from the shipping that passes over them one dollar toll for the upkeep of the harbor or for the benefit of the state.

Applying this practical illustration to the 63 blocks which the state would acquire for harbor purposes, if the property be left in private hands, private interests will to a certainty establish thereon private docks.

As has been said, four great railroads will eventually have terminals in the vicinity of the basin. At this point, more than at any other on San Francisco bay, ship and rail meet under the most advantageous conditions. Here it will be cheaper to transfer freight from ship to train and from train to ship, than at any other point in San Francisco harbor.

The question before the people of California, called upon to vote bonds to acquire this important arm of the bay, is whether the State or private interests are to enjoy the large benefit of water front development in this district. The question before the electors of California is whether the inland harbor at the mouth of Islais Channel is to be under state control, the regular harbor tolls going to the state for harbor maintenance, or whether this harbor is to be given over to private ownership and private control, where the tolls will be paid in private hands, and established, not on the basis of harbor maintenance, but on the monopoly basis of all the traffic will bear.

A vote for the India Basin act, therefore, is a vote for the conservation to the people of the State of California of this inland harbor. A vote against the act is a vote for private interests, which, with the basin safely in their possession, will eventually be able to levy almost unlimited tolls upon the shipping of this port.

Supporters and Opponents

The supporters of the project include the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, the Merchants Association and Merchants Exchange and all the principal commercial and promotion bodies of the city.

The opponents are private interests only, principally warehousemen, draymen and the large lumber concerns, all of whom will profit, or imagine they will profit, if the district is left open to private exploitation.

Rapid Development in Shipping

Even now the available docks of the harbor are congested with the port's increased shipping. Mr. George Renner, at the head of one of the largest draying establishments in San Francisco, told the writer this week that his teams have been obliged to wait for as much as thirty-six hours before securing accommodations on the wharves. It must be borne in mind that the increase of the shipping of the port is constantly upward.

For the fiscal year 1908-09, 6,325,078 tons of shipping passed over the wharves of San Francisco. For the fiscal year of 1909-10, the volume of this traffic had increased to 6,866,148 tons, an increase of 8½ per cent in one year.

The revenues of the state, of course, increase in the same proportion. For the year 1900-01, the port revenues from San Francisco shipping were $772,989.03. For the fiscal year of 1909-10, these revenues had increased to $1,637,949.19.

In voting upon the act, the people of California are given opportunity to decide whether private interests are to cut largely into the revenues of the state from its San Francisco harbor.

Will Not Be Taxed

Another point which can not be too strongly insisted upon, is that not one dollar of state tax, either in payment of interest or principal on the bonds, necessary for the purchase of this property, will be paid by the taxpayers of this state. The act provides that both interest and principal shall be paid out of the revenues of San Francisco harbor. The bonds are to run for seventy-four years. If the basin be permitted to fall into the hands of private interests, these interests will in these seventy-four years collect in monopoly tolls, which they will put into their own pockets, many, many times the million dollars that will be raised from the sale of these bonds.

Influence of the Canal

The increase in San Francisco's shipping, as noted above, has come in the ordinary development of Pacific Coast business. In 1915, the Panama canal is to be opened. This means an increase in Pacific Coast business which few care to estimate. At a bound, Pacific Coast ports will take the highest place among the most important in the world. The 8½ per cent increase in San Francisco's shipping, which looks so well, will in comparison be insignificant beside the showing of the years immediately following the canal's opening. Every foot of the San Francisco water front practically available for shipping purposes will be required.

The facilities on India Basin, where ship and rail meet, will be the most important of the new development.

Is the state or are private interests to reap the benefit?

Part of Canal Work

The development of this inland harbor is, broadly speaking, part of the great scheme of Pacific Coast development, of which the construction of the Panama canal forms the central feature. California's part in the work is to provide facilities for the increased commerce which the opening of the canal will bring.

The best engineers of the county recognize this.

John T. Flynn, harbor engineer for San Diego harbor, stated at a banquet given by the San Francisco Commonwealth Club:

"If there be any reason for not developing Islais Basin harbor, that same reason can be advanced against the construction of the Panama canal."

Every shipper who appreciates what the opening of the canal is to mean for the Pacific Coast, recognizes the justice of Engineer Flynn's statement.

There is no question at all about the basin being developed. Even now private interests, with holdings there, are taking steps toward this development in hopes that the people of California may be misled into voting the project down. There will be an inland harbor at Islais Basin.

Shall it be a private harbor, owned by private interests, maintained for the advantage of private interests and to the detriment of the State of California?

Or shall it be part of the state harbor and a source of advantage and profit for the whole people?

This the people of California will decide on November 8th.

("Tax-Reform Amendment"—Continued)

attention to one of the strongest and best features of the new system; the one thing to be depended upon to make it endure, because based on the eternal principles of right and equity. This letter with the accompanying article asked for called forth from the editor the response: "It is rather exceptional that a man who starts out to be a kicker dislodges so much joy." The whole episode illustrates the way in which the opponents of the measure are trying to "fool the public" by raising false issues. A copy of the article follows.

Yours truly,

CARL C. PLEHN

The question has been raised as to why, under the tax reform amendment the rates charged on the gross earnings of the different classes of corporations are not the same for all. Why, that is, railroads are to pay four per cent, power companies four per cent, telephone companies and telegraph companies three and a half per cent, car companies three per cent and express companies two per cent? Why not all four per cent or all two per cent? It is said that some people voted against the old amendment because they thought that this was unequal. As a matter of fact the rates have to be uniform in order to be equal in proportion to the property used by the different classes of corporations. It is easy enough to see that the express companies use very much less property than do the railroads. So little do they use that the total taxes that they pay under the present system of taxation is only $15,000, while at two per cent of their gross receipts they will pay over $90,000.

The matter is really very simple. The aim is to make the companies pay, as nearly as may be, the same amount in proportion to their property by whatever method the taxes may be determined, as other property holders pay.

The value of property is determined by its

WHAT SATAN THINKS OF THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

"The California Weekly, of which A. J. Pillsbury is editor and Chester H. Rowell is associate editor, is in sore financial straits if we are to judge from a lugubrious letter sent out to the stockholders by Mr. Pillsbury. It seems that the California Weekly has not found "uplifting" a financial success. It has not been popular with advertisers—that is, the kind of uplifting practiced by Pillsbury, Rowell et al. has not invited the support of San Francisco business men. Which is not surprising, seeing that the California Weekly's chief mission has been to publish San Francisco to the world as a sink-hole of corruption and its leading merchants and bankers as a gang of pirates.

"Without giving the reasons for the paper's success, Pillsbury tells the stockholders that: "The managers of the California Weekly have not been able to secure enough advertising patronage to make the paper self-sustaining.

The capital provided (mainly by Rudolph Spreckels) for a two years' experimental venture is being used up. Unless replenished the publication of the paper will be discontinued by the end of the year."

"What will Editor Pillsbury do then, poor thing? But why does not Rudolph Spreckels support his newspaper bantling instead of having his editorial tout send out begging letters to the persons who were buncoed into subscribing for the paper? Has he abandoned the uplift?"

"But Editor Pillsbury has a fine humor for a purveyor of green goods. After telling the subscribers that the California Weekly has been published at a loss ever since it started, he says: "The California Weekly is not likely to ever prove a great money-maker." Then he asks them to buy stock in a losing concern which he candidly admits is never likely to be a paying investment.

"But money paid for the stock will be well spent. It will, in the first place, support A. J. Pillsbury, and in the next it will pay for weekly incense burned at the shrines of Rudolph Spreckels and James D. Phelan. They are rich enough, it is true, to pay for their own touting and for the maintenance of their own literary flunkies, but if the public can be deluded into putting up the money there will be an added zest to their self-advertised virtue. So drop in a dime when Pillsbury passes the hat. Pity the sorrows of a poor sycophant who has to beg from strangers the sustenance denied him by ungrateful patrons. The California Weekly may die, but Pillsbury must live. Don't compel him to prey upon church poor-boxes."—Oakland Tribune, Oct. 10, 1910.

If by any mischance The California Weekly had gained the good opinion of such papers as the Oakland Tribune and the San Francisco Post-Globe, its staff would know that their paper had fallen from grace and was no longer fit to enter the homes of reputable persons. It may be observed also that for the better part of a year Mr. Chester H. Rowell has not been in any way connected with The California Weekly, his work for his own paper and for the redemption of the Republican party from corporation domination having absorbed all his time, his energies and very much of his earnings. Also no shareholder has or ever has had to exceed $500 invested in The California Weekly.

A White Man's View

"Whoever else may or may not read it, every editor in California ought to read his California Weekly every week. It takes a man who is trying to do a thing himself to recognize how much better it can be done, when he is confronted with it done just right. The good writing, the sound information, the sane, clear, matured views on the public affairs of California, as they appear each week in the California Weekly, ought to be and doubtless are the envy of every newspaper man who is vainly striving to reach the same standard. Certainly that is the feeling they arouse in the Republican office. Such a weekly paper, even if it circulated nowhere but in the newspaper offices, would be rendering an invaluable service of leadership to California. Actually, of course, its circulation ought to be limited only by the number of thoughtful readers there are in California. Such a newspaper should be supported by public-spirited citizens everywhere, as an institution filling one of the real needs of the times."—Fresno Republican, Oct. 9, 1910.

Per contra, when The California Weekly receives such words of commendation as the foregoing, from such papers as the Fresno Republican and such men as Chester H. Rowell, its staff knows that their effort has been worth while and that they need make no apologies for their own existence or for the paper they have made.

AS the hands of the clock in the courtroom marked the hour of ten, the door from the judge's chamber opened, and a small, white-haired man stepped out and walked rapidly to the bench. As he entered the courtroom the lawyers inside the bar rose. The judge paused for a moment, standing behind the bench, bowed to the lawyers and quickly seated himself, the lawyers more leisurely and with some confusion dropping into their chairs. Silence fell upon the courtroom, as the judge spoke to the clerk:

"Call the case of the People vs. Sam Chickenhawk."

The clerk rose and read the information in a rapid, singsong voice. Out of the intricate and repetitious phraseology of the complaint—which was yet sonorous and rhythmical and suggestive of the dignity and solemnity of the occasion—the auditors gathered that the great people of the state of California charged Sam Chickenhawk, Indian, with murder in the first degree, in that he did unlawfully, wilfully, deliberately, and with malice aforethought, kill a human being, one Jim Murdock, half-breed, the said homicide being by means of a pistol or rifle bullet and by lying in wait.

As the clerk read, all eyes in the room were turned toward the prisoner, who sat straight upright and motionless. His dark skin was in vivid contrast with the white faces of the others in the room. He was clad in a rough woolen shirt and overalls and heavy shoes. But the greatest contrast offered by him as he sat there was by his countenance. The face of the Chinese is inscrutable to Caucasians, but it is inscrutability born of fear and of a philosophy of passive acceptance of fate. But the face of an Indian is inscrutable from pride. He is unafraid.

Something of this disdainful pride of courage showed in the attitude and expression of Sam Chickenhawk. His case was a not unusual one. His squaw had been ailing, he had sent for the medicine man of his tribe and the medicine man had failed to heal her. As the medicine man is infallible when he wants to be, obviously in this case he had used witchcraft purposely to destroy Sam's squaw. The logic was inevitable. In this case it was clinched by a physical peculiarity of the medicine man; he was cross-eyed; hence he had an evil eye and had lowered it upon Sam's pride. So, as the tribal law had bid him do, Sam had lain in wait for the medicine man on the lonely North Fork road and had shot him dead, without benefit of clergy. And then the white man's law had stepped in and said that the Indian's law was bad; a white man with a rifle had visited Sam's rancheria and told Sam to come along with him, and though Sam could not speak two dozen words of English he did understand the rifle and the crooked forefinger, and had stolidly ridden down from the mountains to the plains and walked into the county jail.

There he stayed for several weeks, thoroughly enjoying the ample food and the tobacco the jailors gave him. Then one day a strange white man came and crooked his forefinger at Sam again, and the jail doors were unlocked and Sam walked a few paces in the open air to a big white building, surmounted by a high dome, and up two flights of stairs to the big room where he now sat. The white man who walked by him had no rifle, but a glance revealed to Sam a familiar bulge at the back of his coat, and he made no move to escape.

Sam followed the events of the courtroom with deep interest, though his face betrayed no sign. He was interested in the difference between the clothes worn by these neat people in the room and the rough wear of the mountain folk. The white collars especially captured his attention. But at last the faces caught and held him. The pallid skin, the restless eyes, the thin, cold lips, fascinated his imagination. He had no basis of knowledge to tell him why these people looked as they did, but instinctively he felt the menace of their racial difference and the greatness of their power. But he felt these things with no sense of terror. Rather they added to his pride in his own unshakable spirit, free and calm in the midst of danger.

As the clerk began to read, Sam realized that this had to do with himself. He did not know what the words meant, but the turning of all eyes in his direction made him conscious that he was the center of this scene. The little white-haired man above him was the chief, these white faced men who sat about him were the council. He had done something that offended white man's law, and all this shifting drama of men rising, speaking, questioning and answering was to effect him somehow. The words were meaningless, but the pantomime was clear.

And yet Sam felt no sense of wrongdoing. His own conscience was clear. Back of his conduct he had the immemorial usage of his tribe, the wisdom of his fathers, the sanction of tribal law. These things were not of written record, he could not lay his finger upon printed characters and say that here he had warrant for his act. But they were of other record, the inscription, upon the soul, of generations of custom, the outgrowth of natural law, the indelible imprint of experience and the accumulated acquiescence of the ages. He had slain the medicine man, not as an act of revenge, but as an act of retributive justice, obeying a mandate of tribal usage that amounted in effect to exactly the same thing as that force of legislative enactment which gave jurisdiction to the white man's court and its equal power to slay, not for revenge but for retributive justice.

In brief, Sam felt himself in the power of a tribunal. That tribunal was of alien race and speech. Its source of law was different. That was what he felt most keenly, that the white man's law was different, not at all that it was better. He felt these things, rather than thought them.

But Sam did not fully sense the width of the gulf that lay between his law and the white man's law. He could not know that the tribunal before which he stood had its own inheritance of immemorial usage; that it ran back to three remote and distinct racial experiences; that it echoed the moral impulse of the Jews, that it reflected the history of Moses and Sinai, of Solomon and David, of John and Jesus; that this fragment of a vast working system of law for a great race bore the imprint of the legions of Rome, of the wisdom of Justinian and Caesar, that the eloquence of Cicero vibrated in it; that this court contained reminiscences of the cold and haggard North, where the Saxons fought and died, that it recalled the battle of Hastings, the inscriptions of Domesday Book, the precious Latin of Magna Charta, the revolution under Cromwell; that its right to sit in judgment was predicated on the struggles of the pilgrim fathers, on the revolution under Washington, that it was colored by the declaration of independence and the bill of rights—in short, that the brain, the blood, the struggles, sufferings, aspirations and wisdom of three races, all were summed up in it, so far as one vessel could contain such a staggering load of even the distilled essence of experience.

Such was the contrast offered by the obscure case of the People vs. Sam Chickenhawk. Alien races and alien experiences, the heritage of a victorious horde of humanity confronting the heritage of a dwindling horde of humanity, the one made flesh in a handful of white-faced, thin lipped, and restless-eyed men, the other made flesh in a dark-skinned, impassive prisoner, brought together by the fortuitous arrangements of Fate, separated in space by a few intervening feet, separated in spirit by a mysterious and impenetrable veil of variation of mind and race and custom and religion and speech.

The veil of speech was soon rent. After the clerk had ceased reading, the judge spoke, one lawyer rose and bowed. He, in turn, spoke to a man who sat beside him, and this man, to Sam's great surprise, spoke to him in his own dialect. A long parley ensued. At length the interpreter shook his head and spoke to the judge.

"May it please your honor, there is no equivalent in the prisoner's tongue for the word 'guilty.' I cannot possibly make him understand the distinction between the question, 'Do you plead guilty' and the question, 'Did you kill deceased.'"

The lawyer who had risen and bowed again rose.

"If your honor please, as I have just now been appointed to defend the accused, and have had no opportunity to investigate his case, may I reserve the right to plead not guilty for him, and in the meantime ask the interpreter to put the direct question to my client?"

"Certainly," replied the judge.

The lawyer turned to the interpreter

"Ask him," he said, "if he did kill this Jim Murdock."

The interpreter repeated the question to Sam in a few monosyllabic grunts. The answer came as swift as a lightning stroke. With a flashing movement, Sam's hands went to his hips and up, and the wrists snapped level with his eyes.

"Yes, me shoot."

The case was closed. Before the finality of that gesture and that phrase the pomp of jury trials, the inscribed circumlocutions of procedure, the tedious dignity of orderly process became the emptiest investiture of absurdity. The laughter that crackled around the room was the tribute of frailer nerves than Sam's to the tension of the moment, so suddenly relieved. The white haired man upon the bench rapped sharply on his desk, the lawyer who had bowed mumbled about "the mercy of the court," the clerk wrote strange characters in a book, which the judge signed, and the white man with the bulging hip pocket crooked his forefinger again at Sam, who rose and followed him with conscious pride. As they walked past the lawyers' table Sam paused and spoke to the interpreter, who replied by holding up the five fingers of his right hand. He opened and shut them four times and spoke monosyllables to Sam. And Sam Chickenhawk summed up the cosmic comedy and tragedy of the scene, laid emphasis upon the blindness of the veil that hung between him and his judges, concentrated the racial struggle and the racial pride and the racial contempt in one simple act. He smiled.

As We View Men

A reformer—One who realizes that we need to be reformed, and acts accordingly.

An odious interloper—One who realizes that we need to be reformed, and acts accordingly.

An excellent citizen—One who realizes that we need to be reformed, and acts accordingly.

A pestiferous meddler—One who realizes that we need to be reformed, and acts accordingly.

So I might continue, Leonidas, but what's the use? Have I not made clear enough the point that what you consider a man depends upon your point of view?

If you believe in saving the boys and girls, young men and young women, older men and older women, from the lures of a double tenderloin, you consider the man who works to that end a reformer; if, on the contrary, you are financially or immorally interested in red-light attractions, you consider such a man an odious interloper.

If you hold that there should be one brand of justice for rich and poor you will consider a Henry, who gave about all but life, and nearly gave his life, for the administration of such justice, a most excellent citizen; but if you are of those who insist that Big Interests should be permitted to buy success, even at the price of boodle, you will consider him a pestiferous meddler.

Don't you see, Leonidas, that it is yourself, far more than the man whom you are discussing, whom you "size up" when you give your opinion of him? You cannot escape it, nor can the rest of us. In approving or denouncing others, we inevitably announce the class in which we belong.

("Tax-Reform Amendment"—Concluded)

net income. Thus a farm that yields net $10 per acre is worth at least $100 per acre. But one that yields only $5.00 per acre is worth only half as much. The same is true of corporate property; if the risk is the same a stock that pays six per cent in dividends is worth twice as much as one that pays only three per cent.

The new taxes are to be in proportion to the gross earnings, because it has been found that these taxes are simpler and easier to administer than any others. The problem, therefore, was to find what per cent of the gross earnings would be equal to one per cent on the true value of the property. One per cent of the true value of the property (not, of course, of the assessed value, which is anywhere from twenty-five to eighty per cent of the true value) is very close to the average taxes paid by property throughout the state. To solve this problem we have first to ascertain what proportion of the gross receipts are net. It is a fact that in each of the different lines of corporate industry there is a fairly definite ratio of net to gross earnings. Thus in the case of the railroads, about one-third of all their receipts are net, while in the case of express companies only about one-sixth is net. So if four per cent is a fair rate on the railroads then two per cent would be fair for the express companies. The same thing can be illustrated by two farms; one yields, let us say, $50.00 per acre, of which $10.00 is clear profit. The farm is worth $100.00 per acre (or more), and the tax should be $1.00 per acre, or two per cent of the gross receipts. Another also yields $50.00 per acre, but only $5.00 clear. The latter is worth, say, $50.00 per acre and the tax at one per cent should be 50 cents per acre, and that is only one per cent of the gross receipts.

Three-fourths of the report of the tax commission for 1906 was devoted to the study of the data upon which the rates are based. Copies of this report, as well as of the new report, can be had on application to the secretary of the state tax commission, 2308 Waring street, Berkeley, Cal.

But the proof of the pudding is in the eating. If any one finds the recipe hard to follow let him console himself with the results. The new system may not be perfect, but it is infinitely better than the old one. Under the old system the best that we could do was to make the railroads pay $1,300,000 per annum, under the new, they will pay $2,200,000. At the other extreme are the express companies, which now pay on their horses, wagons and safes about $15,000 per annum, while two per cent on their gross receipts amounts to $90,000. In the aggregate the amendment increases the taxes of all the corporations by over $4,000,000. Not one of them is "cinched," and not one of them can evade the new taxes.

A pudding as good as this in the eating must have been made from a good recipe.

JUST JOKES

An old gentleman, who was in the habit of bestowing fatherly affection upon the young ladies who visited his daughter, answered a ring at his door about dusk one evening, and recognizing, as he thought, in the dim light one of his daughter's young friends, he picked her up in his arms, being in jocular mood, and was bearing her through the hall, when the astonished burden ejaculated: "Fo' Gawd, Mars' Tom, is yo' gwine to c'y de ole nigger clean back to de kitchen?"—New York Sun.

In Zanesville, Ohio, they tell of a young widow, who, in consulting a tombstone maker with reference to a monument for her late husband, ended the discussion with: "Now, Mr. Jones, all I want to say is, 'To My Husband' in an appropriate place." "Very well, ma'am," said the stonecutter. When the tombstone was put up the widow discovered, to her amazement, that upon it were inscribed these words: "To My Husband. In an Appropriate Place."

LAST SUMMER'S FOREST FIRES

By COERT DUBOIS,

Associate District Forester

As early as last May the forest officers in western Montana and northern Idaho realized that this was going to be an exceptionally dry and dangerous season for fires. The summer started in exactly like the season of 1889 when large areas of timberland now included in the national forests of this region were burned over. The predictions were more than verified. All through June and July the drouth continued and the rangers were kept on the jump. By the middle of August they had put out over 3,000 small fires and had 90 large ones, covering 500 acres or more each, practically under control.

The greatest hindrance in this work was the lack of trails by which the fires could be reached quickly. On August 19 a fire on the headwaters of the St. Joe River had covered between one and two thousand acres. Five crews, totaling about 400 men, were at work on it and had thrown a fire line almost completely around it. Another fire had been burning for a week to the southwest of this one and a large crew of men were working their way to it, being forced to cut a trail every foot of the way through dense timber and underbrush in order to move their supplies. These two fires typify the conditions that had to be met, and were met, by the forest officers. Fires which could be reached were brought under control quickly and efficiently; those in the back country remote from any means of communication had to burn unrestrained until fire-fighting crews could work their way into them cutting trails as they went. If conditions had remained normal all fires on the Cabinet, Pend d'Oreille, Kootenai, Coeur d'Alene and Lolo national forests would have been brought under control in a very short time by the 1,500 or 2,000 men then in the field.

But conditions did not remain normal. On the afternoon of August 20 a hurricane started which could no more be foreseen or provided against than the San Francisco earthquake and fire. The force of this wind can scarcely be imagined. It uprooted standing trees before the fire reached them; rangers on patrol could not stay in the saddle in the face of it. It blew fire from smoldering stumps and logs inside the lines of the controlled fires and started new ones by the hundreds. It caused the fires which had not yet been reached by fire-fighting crews to jump to the tops and travel with amazing rapidity. Sheets of flame swept through the crowns of trees, jumping canyons like that of the St. Joe River—not by blowing burning brands across, but by the flames actually leaping hundreds of yards and igniting the crowns of the trees on the far side. In twenty-four hours the scattered fires had united and made a solid burn along the Idaho-Montana divide between 125 and 150 miles long.

Ranger Hahn, who with his crew was missing for so long a time, was cutting his way into a fire on the St. Joe River just before the hurricane started. He had posted a lookout on a high hill with instructions to warn the crew at the first sign of danger. On the afternoon of the 20th, this lookout came crashing down through the brush shouting, "Get out, boys, she's a-coming!" With perfect coolness the ranger collected his crew, moved them down to the river and onto a small island in the middle of it. He even got all of his pack animals and supplies across and made camp. She came. A roaring wall of flame driven by the hurricane went by on each side of the river but the men were so far out of harm's way that one even tried to photograph the fire with a kodak. One of the men described the noise of that passage as being "like a freight train a mile long going over a covered bridge, and you under it."

When the hurricane started, the forest officers, realizing the danger, abandoned the fight and bent their efforts to getting their crews out safely. Remarkable coolness and a keen realization of their responsibility were shown by these men. Ranger Pulaski, a descendant of the Revolutionary hero, showed particular heroism, bringing out the bulk of his men in safety although he, himself, was so badly burned that he is still in the hospital and may lose the sight of one eye.

Over half the loss of life (which was greatly exaggerated) was caused by the failure of the crews to obey orders. One crew of 66 men at work on a fire north of Avery were ordered to come out with all possible speed. A messenger was sent to notify each man personally. Thirty-seven of this crew obeyed orders and reached Avery safely, while the other twenty-nine decided to stay where they were, saying that there was no danger and that the ranger was unduly exercised. Out of this crew who refused to obey orders, twenty-four bodies have been recovered and five are missing. The death roll from these fires is under 100. The bodies of 73 temporary employees of the forest service have been found. Fifteen are missing. Eight people not connected with the service are known to have been killed. Three forest officers and about fifteen hired fire fighters are in the hospital from injuries received on the fighting line. The National Red Cross is taking care of the injured and the bodies of the identified are being sent to their homes and the unidentified dead buried at permanent ranger stations in the forests with a contribution fund raised by forest officers all over the United States.

It is probable that more than 2,000,000 acres were burned over last summer in northern Idaho and western Montana. Over ninety per cent of this damage resulted from the cyclone of August 20 and 21. It would be interesting, perhaps, to hear what the district forester at Missoula has to say in regard to the fire situation in this district, since he was in direct charge of all fire fighting work done by the forest service.

"Without exception," says District Forester Greeley, "the destructive fires in this district were crown fires carried through the tops of the trees by the violent winds and feeding only secondarily upon whatever inflammable material there was on the ground. Even prior to the cyclone, the only serious factor we had to contend with was the frequency of comparatively high winds which carried the fire up into the crowns and made it extremely difficult to control them. The ground fires were not difficult to control. In substantiation of this I simply point out the fact prior to the hurricane of August 20, over 90 fires of large proportions were put under control and over 3,000 small fires were put out by individual patrolmen or small crews. Our whole experience this summer showed conclusively that, in a season of such an exceptional character as to drought and winds, the use of fire in the woods under any conditions is exceedingly dangerous. Every lumberman familiar with the situation will agree with me that the only good fire is a dead fire and that the only sane protective policy to follow is to keep fire out of the woods altogether, except in burning slashings on small areas in the proper season and under a strong guard of men. All the ground burnings in the world will not protect a dense stand of timber from crown fires under the force of high winds, and the larger the territory burned over for protection purposes leaving smoldering fires in old logs at many points, the greater the danger that high winds when they do occur will create destructive crown fires."

This is pretty strong talk. It is a clear, convincing statement (by the one man in the country best qualified to know) that the accumulation of inflammable material on the ground resultant on keeping fires out of the forests was not the cause of the catastrophe. Further than that, this man whose experience in directing fire fighting work cannot now be questioned, states point blank that the only policy to follow is to keep fire out of the woods altogether save in exceptional cases.

In the north where they occurred, the forests are much more dense and the danger of crown fires ten times greater than in California. In fact, in the mature yellow pine, sugar pine and douglas fir forests of the Sierra and Coast ranges, it may be said that the risk of crown fires is practically nil except in small areas of young timber. And ground fires can be controlled. Now if these two things are so—that crown fires occur only as often as cyclones do and that ground fires can be controlled—the application of the theory of "light burnings," with eminent danger of the fire spreading and unavoidable damage to young growth, would seem to be of very doubtful wisdom.

We would especially mention the Century Path, a weekly illustrated, which is a work of art as to its typography and illustrations, while the subject matter is of the highest order, which deals with the problems of the day from a Theosophical standpoint; also the Theosophical Manuals, written with a view of meeting the interest of inquirers; a Point Loma edition of "The Key to Theosophy," by H. P. Blavatsky, written especially for students; "Studies in Occultism," also by the same writer, and "Echoes from the Orient," by William P. Judge, successor to Madame Blavatsky. To one who is interested in the ancient Wisdom Religion these books will be of the deepest interest.

All of the above are the product of the Aryan Theosophical Press at Point Loma, and it will easily be conceded that their work will compare with any in artistic finish and accuracy.

State Hospital Management

Years ago as the writer of this was going through the State Hospital for the Insane at Napa, and was on the point of passing out of one of the wards, a motherly old lady, a patient, with much feeling, said to him: "Never cease to thank God, night and morning, as long as you live, that you are in possession of your right mind." Not all of those who are not appreciate that they are not, but relatively fewer who are in their right minds ever think to be thankful that they are, and yet there is no other calamity that can befall a human being comparable to that of insanity. It were a hundred times better to be dead and, sometime, when the world shall have come to putting aside sentimentalism in dealing with scientific problems, it is not impossible that the chronic insane may be put to death, painlessly and tenderly but inevitably.

Meantime, the state must care for its insane. Individuals cannot, and the burden of care is one that all should share. California possesses five great hospital plants, costing millions of dollars, and they are all filled to overflowing. The hospital population of the five institutions aggregate nearly 7,000, not to speak of the feeble minded, who number 850 more. Each one of these hospitals is directly managed by a superintendent, a medical staff, a steward and a large number of minor officers and attendants.

The power and authority in each hospital inferentially vests in a board of five managers appointed by the Governor to serve four years, the terms of no more than two members of each board of five expiring in any one year. This board has power to elect a superintendent and a treasurer, and to remove the same for cause stated in writing after hearing had. On the face of it this is all the direct appointing power the board has, although all the appointees of the superintendent, who is the executive officer of the institution, must be made with the advice and consent of the board of managers. Where the power actually rests is, in each institution, a question of dominance of the personalities who make up the board, the superintendent and, sometimes, the steward. The master spirit, wherever he may be, is either likely to rule or to make it exceedingly difficult to overrule such personage. If, as the law of fitness requires, the superintendent is the dominant power, his burden is made more onerous than it ought to be by having to manage a board of managers in addition to managing the institution given into his charge.

Back of the board of managers sits the governor of the state by virtue of his appointive power, and his power of removal, for adequate cause after hearing, of the adequacy of which he is judge and jury. Few boards relish going up against the Governor, and a militant, headstrong Governor is likely to have his will registered, if he has a will to register, about as he wants it. Ordinarily, governors prefer to take the direction of least resistance and interfere with the management of boards of managers as little as possible.

A serious difficulty with the whole system is that full responsibility is nowhere certainly and adequately fixed. The board of managers is hampered by the need for the approval, at every step, of the State Lunacy Commission; the superintendent is hampered by both his board of managers and the lunacy commission; the General Superintendent comes in for a share of the hampering as well as for a share of being hampered. There are checks and balances enough in the system to more than suffice for the legislative, executive and judicial departments of national government.

But a still graver difficulty is the patronage feature that permeates our State Hospital system from top to bottom. The lunacy commission, the members of the board of managers, the governor and most of the legislators, either "put in" or try to put into these institutions their political friends. The boards of managers are commonly made up of politicians given their places on the boards of management either in recognition of political favors received or in expectation of their being performed in the future. The whole system rests on a basis inconsistent with sound principles of government.

However, the worst feature of all, perhaps, is that interest in each institution is localized. All of them were located, in the first place, not with so much reference to where they ought to be for the best service to the state, but in order to "get things," by log rolling methods, for each such community. These are all state institutions to be handled with reference to what is best for the state and local interest should have nothing to do with them.

The whole system needs overhauling. The local boards should be abolished and a state department substituted, as suggested last week, thus putting the power where the responsibility is. Such a system would be able to treat the state hospital problem as one problem and a great number of small tax eaters and petty political personalities could be dispensed with.

The claims which these unfortunates have upon the state is akin to that claim which the child has upon the parent, it is a claim for care the most humane, and sympathy the most keen. To make the wards of the state in any sense the victims of the exigencies of politics or subjects for "pork barrel" methods is to prove false to that paternalism inseparable from the care of such wards.

When Ethel Weeps

When Ethel weeps each crystal tear
Is as a sorrow-laden sphere,
A rounded orb of quenchless woe,
And, oh, the anguish-burdened flow

Doth know no pause,
Yet ask me not why she doth weep,
To solve that question I've lost sleep
"Wherefore these weeps?" oft question I,
And then she maketh sad reply:
"Why—well—because!"

The Latest Test

"He is generally recognized as a leading citizen."
"Yes? What was the nature of the charge embodied in the indictment?"

No More Fines For Smuggling

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE HAND of New York has announced that his brother judges, Holt and Hough, have agreed with him to impose no more fines upon rich smugglers who fetch through the port of New York contraband goods with intent to defraud the revenues. Let no globe trotter rejoice in that announcement. The court will try the virtues of good, stiff terms of imprisonment instead of fines. That is different, so different that the pity is that the honorable judges had not gotten their heads together earlier. May all other courts profit by the example.

Wonder How He Feels About It Now!

WHEN AT THE ZENITH of his glory David Bennett Hill of New York declared that he would rather have behind him the saloons of the empire state than all the churches ten times over. Wonder how he feels about that now! He died yesterday morning.

A Question of Law

ABE RUEF WAS RELEASED ON BAIL because confinement in jail was proving injurious to his health. So far as that goes confinement in a palace would prove injurious to the health of any one. But why should Ruef be liberated and not the others? Had the appellate court withheld its hand Judge Lawlor would have determined the issue yesterday. Now the appellate court will determine it. The point of law is: If one judge release a prisoner on bail may another judge restore him to custody? Are the orders of a court like the laws of the Medes and Persians? This paper is averse to seeing Abe Ruef made the scapegoat for the whole grafting gang, but it is equally averse to seeing him liberated from prison, pending appeal, when others in the same predicament have not the same privilege. The decision of the appellate tribunal will be awaited with great interest.

Give Us Younger Men

ELIHU ROOT IS BEING TALKED OF for Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. He is a great lawyer and a big-brained man. He is in his sixty-sixth year and might be counted on for five to ten years of splendid service on that bench, but how shall we be rid of him when his dotage comes? Aye, there's the rub! A supreme bench of doddering dotards living on reputations made in their prime is a menace to the nation. Therefore, pending the enactment of a statute that shall make retirement from the bench on full pay permissible at seventy and compulsory at seventy-five, give us younger appointees to that exalted office, Mr. President.

Gillett at the Johnson Lunch

THERE ARE THOSE WHO AFFECT to believe that because Governor Gillett attended the Johnson lunch and spoke kindly of Mr. Johnson's candidacy, in order to be consistent, Mr. Johnson should have thrown the governor out neck and heels. Nonsense! There is probably no man in all California who feels more keenly the degradation of Southern Pacific domination of Republican politics than James N. Gillett. There has not been a day since he took the Santa Cruz nomination that he has not felt the smart of it and has not known in his heart that he bought his preferment at a greater price than any man can afford to pay. Good Republican that he is, he no doubt rejoices to see the dawning of a better day. Had he been less of a man than he is he would have sulked, like George Knight, or stewed himself in his own bitterness, like W. F. Herrin. It was good for the Governor to be there. It was good for Mr. Johnson to welcome him.

Julia Ward Howe

SHE COULD NOT LIVE ALWAYS, but she made out to for ninety-one beneficent years, and now at last her "eyes have seen the glory," of which she sang while millions joined in the chorus. A great life and a fruitful almost to the end! Compare it with the life of David Bennett Hill, for instance! The homage of a nation shows what is worth while and what is not. Why should anyone ever be in doubt?

Let Us Hope It Is Not So

FROM PRESS REPORTS it would appear that Professor Woodworth, of the State University, entertains some sort of belief that nature may be working to evolve a naturally sterile womanhood to be workers in the hive of industry, side by side with their brothers, while their prolific sisters mother the race. Let us hope that no such thing will come to pass. Such women would be abnormal and awful, worse kickers than mules. Celibacy is abnormality. Better polygamy, almost, than that. If nature has not gone crazy she will proceed to evolve a condition imperative to make every man a husband, every woman a wife. In fact, little else is needful to that end than to have all men get aboard the "water wagon." That would just about solve the celibacy problem now and forever.

Not So

THE PRO-GRAFT PRESS, or at least a part of it, would make Judge Lawlor out to be a patron of slugging and a sport of low degree. It is not so. Judge Lawlor never saw but two prize fights in his life, and they grew out of a rivalry between the Olympic club, to which he belonged, and another. He has not, since he went on the bench, seen so much as a sparring match between amateurs just for fun, but he has taken an interest in athletics and in that fellowship with manly men which atones as far as may be for not having a home of his own. But then, with the higher-up press, it is "anything to beat Lawlor," so what is the odds what is said or who says it?

Keep Your Eye On New York

LET US NOT BECOME so engrossed with our own affairs as to be unmindful of the great battle for clean politics now waging in New York state, with Theodore Roosevelt and his associates on the one side arrayed against Tammany Hall and Wall street on the other. The conservative press is sceptical of the success of the Lion Hunter. Tammany and Wall street are supposed to have no terrors for Yorkers, but of that we shall know more after the election. It is entirely possible that the newer nationalism may receive a setback, but it cannot be defeated. If beaten in New York it will be taken to the country and won there, after which, if not before, New York will come into line. Tammany is fighting, Wall street is fighting, and why in the name of justice and fair play should it be improper for Theodore Roosevelt to take up the gauge of battle they throw down? There are none so hard to suit as those whose sympathies are with the other fellow, and that seems to be the case with the so-called conservative press of the East, as particularly exemplified in the New York Evening Post and Springfield Republican.

Are Bankers Bad Losers?

Certain San Francisco bankers are protesting against the adoption of Amendment Number One, now that the legislature has advanced the banking rate of taxation from six-tenths of one per cent to one per cent.

Their plaint is that the "excessive rate" will tend to cause the banks to distribute their surplus and undivided profits (in order to evade a part of the tax) and so lessen loanable capital; that this will advance interest rates; that it will tend to introduce Eastern methods of banking, which are more conservative than those obtaining in California.

If these objections were all well taken they would not justify opposition to the adoption of Amendment Number One, but they are not. From July 1908 to July 1909 the banks of California, as a whole, earned a net income on capital, surplus and undivided profits of 9.83 per cent. A tax of one-tenth of the net earnings of capital is not burdensome, nor unjust, and is a less tax than the average property in California will pay. The writer of this has two houses rented across the bay. The tax on one is 17 per cent of the gross income and on the other 19 per cent, and he has no reason to suppose that his property either rents lower or is taxed higher than other Oakland residence property will average.

The tax of one per cent on capital, surplus and undivided profits of banks obtains in Connecticut, New York and Pennsylvania. Does that tax there cause the banks to lessen their loanable capital by distributing their surplus and undivided profits? The percentage of surplus and undivided profits of the national banks of California to their capital stock is 66.5. In New York state, exclusive of reserve cities, it is 88. In New York City it is 123.5. In Pennsylvania it is 126. In Connecticut, 77.6. In all of these states the percentage of surplus and undivided profits to capital stock in national banks is greater than in California, notwithstanding that in those states banks pay one per cent in taxes, whereas in California they have been paying very much less than one per cent, in fact, as a whole, less than one-half of one per cent.

Will the banks pass the four-tenths of one per cent in excess of, to use an expression hallowed by Southern Pacific memories, what they were "minded to pay" on to the borrowers? Very likely they will if they can, but are they not now charging what the traffic will bear? If they are will it bear more after the tax is increased than before? But suppose they do, what will it amount to to the borrower?

The four-tenths per cent added at Sacramento will add $599,000 to the tax burden of the banks of California. Their entire resources, capital, surplus, undivided profits, deposits and all loanable assets amount to $952,859,000, of which the $599,000 would be .000629 of one per cent, or if a man borrowed $1,000 for a year he might have to pay about .63 cents more for his money if he stood his full share of the brunt of that tax. Does not this objection appear to be a trifle childish?

As to introducing more conservative Eastern banking methods as a result of this tax, that should make votes for the amendment rather than against. At a time when we of California were reduced to the use of clearing house certificates, and every day was made a holiday for months for the protection of the banks against indignant depositors, in Iowa there was not a clearing house certificate issued or a depositor denied his cash on demand. The surplus and undivided profits, and a considerable share of the deposits in the banks of Iowa, were not sustaining stock speculations in Wall Street, New York, but were at home, where they should be, doing a conservative banking business. The threatened adoption of such a banking policy in California will be among the least of our anxieties.

If the bankers of California possessed any sense of humor they would first indulge in a hearty laugh at a good joke on themselves and then turn in and work for the success of the amendment with a will. For, be it known, the calling of the late extra session of the legislature, all framed up, as was thought, so that the legislators could not depart from the work as laid out for them, was all the work of the now protesting bankers. They wanted the amendment, with its six-tenths per cent bank tax feature, made the irrevocable law of the state, but the legislators got off the reservation and went on the warpath, boosted the bank tax four-tenths more and reduced the three-fourths vote to two-thirds. Wherefore the same bankers sulk in their tents whetting their knives against the amendment as a whole. The joke is on the protesting banks. They should enjoy it with the rest of us. They are proving bad losers.

The Rights and Wrongs of Riches

One who walks no more with The California Weekly because he likes not its spirit declares his own convictions substantially as follows:

"I am in thorough accord with any movement that attempts to better present conditions, but I do not think that unmerciful and unending criticism is the way to do it.

"During a man's life what he has is his own to do with as he pleases and if he choose to keep it until he dies, and then leave it for his executors to carry out his benevolent intentions, there is no just ground for criticism of his actions.

"Every man should first make ample provision for his family, bequests made at their expense should be nullified by law. After these things are done he should make charitable bequests in large measure.

"Income taxes should be so graduated as to render impossible the extremely large fortunes which are a menace at any time, but one, ten or twenty millions in the hands of any man do not constitute such a menace."

The issues involved in the foregoing, which are here restated in the interests of brevity, but fairly we think, are vital to our time, perhaps to all time. As a man, a nation or a civilization thinks, so is it. Therefore it must think clearly and right or go wrong. Does our correspondent think clearly and right?

Criticism is a perpetual Day of Judgment. From Isaiah to Jesus, from Jeremiah to Theodore Roosevelt, the actions of men have been forced to endure the test of measurements of their acts by standards which the wise and good have set up. Such criticisms have been incessant and uncompromising. No Garrison, no Philips, no Bryan and no Roosevelt was ever more drastic and unsparing in criticism than was the Savior of Men and his "woe unto you" has come on through nineteen centuries gathering in volume and power day by day, shaking thrones and overturning civilizations, never so potently at work as now. Criticism may be senseless, criticism may be unjust, but criticism there must be, criticism that spares not the lash until mercy is cried for and penitence is professed in tears, else a wrong-headed world will never be turned right. The standards of right are absolute and eternal, and it is the lot of man to be judged by them hourly, daily, all through life, ending with the Day of Judgment which no man may escape. In kindness or in wrath criticism must never sleep. It is ever on guard and must be or all cannot be well with the world.

The only thing that any man has that is his own to do with as he will is his own soul, and the Devil may get that if he doesn't watch out. All else he possesses subject to the common welfare. His wife, his children may be taken from him, his own liberty, his property may be taxed out of existence. Ownership is trusteeship. If a man may do what he likes with his own it is because human experience has demonstrated the general wisdom of such a policy, but there is in that largeness of liberty no exemption from criticism. There are legalities that are moral monstrosities, yet, on the whole, it has hitherto been thought better to suffer the monstrosities to exist than to disturb the legalities. Initiative, ambition to acquire—it is wise to give them ample room even at the risk of developing greed, but the right of criticism to dog their every step, to hold up before them the eternal verities that they may be measured by them at every turn, that is the condition upon which all liberties are to be permitted.

A desire to make provision for the family is inspiration for enterprise. Take it away and stagnation will result, but it is no absolute right. Society must exert an over-lordship over it. What right has any son or daughter to live a life of frivolous idleness and lavish display merely because the father was a money-maker? The idle rich are the parents of anarchy. They spawn envy, jealousy and hate. No man has a right to endow frivolity and idleness. Therefore the entailment of estates is to be fought, also their being confided to trust management. The next great reform needed, perhaps, is to compel the closing of estates within five years and the absolute division to those of age, to hold if the heirs can, to squander if they will, but to get back into the common fund as soon as the fortune may, unhampered by entailments, trusteeships or incorporation.

It is not the size of the fortune that is dangerous. There would be no more sense in limiting the size of a man's fortune by law than in limiting his chest measure, the strength of his arm, the horse-power he shall put into an engine or electric motor. Let every man have according to his strength to handle. There was never yet a man too big or too strong, too rich or too skilled in finance. The world needs big men. What we need to limit is the ways in which fortunes may be acquired to right ways. It is because the Carnegies and Rockefellers, Morgans and Harrimans are robbers that society needs to limit their unlawful activities and punish them if it can. They are financial freebooters, as were the Huntingtons, Crockers, Stanfords and their kind. They took to themselves by financial force and political fraud the earnings of the many and the heritage of the multitude. With fair dealing no man can become dangerously rich. Without it every man is a social menace, be he big or little. It is not great wealth that we should fight, but great wrong, chiefly in the form of special privilege.

Income taxes are right because some part of the common cost of government should be paid according to ability, but inheritance taxes are better because no man has more than a life interest in anything. The right to bequeath is only a privilege to be limited as the common welfare may require or taken away altogether if, sometime, that shall be found wisest and best, though it is not likely that society will ever wish to go so far as that.

The doctrine of trusteeship, of accountability for stewardship, of subjection to criticism, applies from every nickel fed into a slot machine to every hundred millions invested in oil, in railroads, in manufactories of steel and iron. No man is master of anything except his own soul, and the Devil may get that if he don't watch out.

Oakland's Waterfront Again

Elsewhere in this issue of The California Weekly Mr. B. H. Pendleton, of Oakland's city council, replies to Mr. McPike's article in our issue of September 30. What he has to say in defense of the proposed franchise grant is important, but not wholly conclusive.

Our big railroads must find harbor facilities upon this bay. Neither state nor city nor national government stands ready to equip the harbors with all the facilities required. Therefore the railroads must be permitted, and encouraged, to equip themselves with such harbor facilities as their business warrants. The attitude toward these corporations should be liberal, just and far-seeing, but that does not imply that they should be accorded all that they may demand.

It was announced weeks ago that the negotiations between Oakland and the Southern Pacific Company had been concluded in a way altogether satisfactory to Oakland, and yet, since that announcement, many modifications of the terms of the franchise have been made in the public interest, two very important ones, as will be seen from Mr. Pendleton's communication, no longer ago than on Monday of this week. Is it not possible that, with further scrutiny, something more may be found that should be written into that document before everlastingly too late? The more it is hammered at the nearer right it will become.

On the west side of the bay tolls are fixed by the state because the state owns the wharfing privileges. Why should not the tolls on the east side of the bay be fixed by the city of Oakland for parity of reason? In no other way can all forms of discrimination be certainly prevented.

It is stipulated in the franchise that, at the end of fifty years, the mole is to be ceded to the city in fee and the superstructures at a valuation then to be fixed. Why at any valuation at all? Every fifty year franchise to a public service corporation presumes that the use will, in fifty years, pay a good rate of interest on the investment all through that period, and repay the original investment, whereupon the entire property should revert to the city without any payment whatever.

Finally, no fifty year franchise involving issues of such vast importance to the future of a city should be granted without a vote of the people of such city, and it is not at all unlikely that, by the time the franchise can be submitted, after the adoption of the new charter, some other good things can be hammered into it. There should be no great haste. Oakland is not likely to lose the Southern Pacific and the Southern Pacific is not likely to lose interest in having a franchise to operate its pier. No danger attends upon this delay.

Amendment Number Eleven

This amendment, to be voted on at the coming election, has received less consideration in the press of the state than it deserves. At the request of The California Weekly Mr. George E. Crothers, who has given great attention to tax laws and principles, offers, elsewhere in this paper, a clear exposition of the proposed amendment which we commend to our brethren of the press as worthy of being passed on to the readers of their own papers.

It probably is true that no laws restricting freedom of contract in relation to the borrowing and lending of money ever had any effect other than to make borrowing more difficult and costly, and yet that does not afford sufficient reason for giving the lender all the points in the law and the borrower none.

The "New Constitution" provided not only that the mortgage interest in lands should be separately taxed, but that any contract to have that interest taxed otherwise should be void. It is alleged in the "boost" sent out from the office of the Secretary of State with copies of the amendment, that this provision of the constitution commonly resulted in adding tremendously to the lender's profits and to the borrower's injury, and yet it was always the lender who proposed to change the law and always the borrower who voted against the change. Finally, in 1906, the right of borrower and lender to contract as to which should pay the tax on the mortgage interest was conceded by constitutional amendment, submitted again at the instance of the lender, not the borrower.

But that did not satisfy the benevolent impulses of the lender. He is still fearful that he may be making too much money off the lending of his capital and he wishes still further to relieve the borrower from burden by exempting mortgage interests from all taxation. It is probable, as Mr. Crothers shows, that the amendment will not do what is expected of it. If it should do it it ought not. It is everlastingly true that the mortgage interest in property is a property interest and, as such, should be taxed in the county, city and town where the land itself is situated. Now that there is entire freedom to agree as to who shall pay that tax, whether it shall be deducted from the interest charged or added to it, it would seem that a satisfactory basis had been reached.

It is true that if mortgage interests were exempt from taxation separate mortgage records would not have to be kept either by lenders or borrowers, banks or county assessors, but it may be doubted if the saving in clerical work will justify the abandonment of a sound principle of taxation, viz: that the mortgage interest is a solvent credit, is property and should bear its share of taxation the same as the equity of the mortgagor. There is a lurking suspicion that the benevolence of the lender may have been overestimated. Adown the ages he was not wont to be so kind.

Vote against amendment eleven, first, because it will not accomplish what it undertakes to and, second, it would not be in accordance with sound policy if it did.

What To Do With the Money

It is probable that the constitutional amendments in aid of the Panama-Pacific exposition will carry and that congress will recognize San Francisco as The Place to hold the national exposition. While we are awaiting the fruition of these hopes we may well discuss what to do with the money when we get it. Elsewhere in this paper Mr. Elmer Edwards, worth Carey discusses the feasibility of creating, in Golden Gate park, a permanent amusement city as a result of the fair. His suggestions will repay consideration. Other suggestions of a rational character will find welcome in the columns of this paper. The legislative authorization to hold the fair in Golden Gate park was not mandatory. Efforts will be made to locate the exposition on private grounds for private advantage. That must not be permitted if it can be prevented, and the way to prevent it is to devise a better way and fight for its adoption.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

For a matter of thirty years a certain man has worked, more or less, on Sundays. In thirty years there are 1,560 Sundays, exactly sixty working months, or five full years of time gained, giving his thirty prime years of maturity the value of thirty-five. Allowing for nothing in the way of lack of efficiency, because of being constantly overworked, he is five years ahead of where he would have been had he refrained from Sunday work.

But he is ten years older than he should be at his age. That puts a different face on the proposition. Instead of having gained five years by working Sundays he has lost five, and he has probably lost no little beside through lack of that rest of mind or body which he should have had.

It was not greed of gain that prompted this Sunday work. When he began work for himself he was not fully prepared for his task and had to work overtime and Sundays to make up for lack of adequate preparation when he should have made it. That used up all the Sundays there were during his first five years of independent effort. In point of time this was 260 days, equivalent to 13 school months or, practically, a year and a half of schooling, but it is probable that half a year in a school teaching just the things he needed to know, at just the time when he would have learned the most easily, would have given him a full equivalent for all that he taught himself in those 260 Sundays.

After that there came to be a good deal of public work to do, and as this certain man had all that he could do all the week, he got into the habit of laying aside this free, public work to be done on Sunday. There wasn't any other time and he had to be obdurate and say, "no," or shave, look over the morning paper a few minutes, yawn and go at it. There is just such a job now pending. This certain man has had fewer vacations than he should have had even if he had all his Sundays thrown in beside, but he has not had them thrown in and, after thirty years of Sunday working, he does not quite see how all Sunday work can be dispensed with. How can it? The penalty is easy to see, for people take him to be years older than he is and, by a hundred tests, he feels the creeping paralysis of the years that he should not feel for years to come.

The history of Sunday is peculiar. It has a lunar origin, savants tell us, and among the Arabs, who set it down as an unlucky day, it was taboo. Any work done on that day was likely not to turn out fortunately. It was akin to planting corn or potatoes in the wrong time of the moon. What began, so students of the institution tell us, as a superstitious custom soon came to have a religious sanction and, when the Hebrews adopted the custom and found it good, they gave to it their customary sanction of "Thou shalt not." Among all the institutions of men there is none of greater value to the individual or the race than the making of the Sabbath day a day of rest from the ordinary vocations of life, for the refreshment of the mind and the spirit. This certain man knows this, has known it all along and, to his knowledge, he has not in his thirty years of Sunday labor devoted so much as a single Sunday to earning or making money, but rather to catching up the loose ends that had been let drop during the week, to getting a little start on the work of the week following or to performing some unrequitable service for the public.

That it does not pay is, as we have seen, mathematically demonstrable. If the middle years of life are heaped fuller of achievement than they otherwise would be, which also may be doubted, the end of the thread is inevitably snipped off the shorter for it. How shall any of the world's busy people (who perforce must do what the unbusy leave undone), how shall they "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy?" Must the thunders of Sinai roar ever in their ears to make it possible for them to say, "No?" It would seem

Increase From One Grain of Wheat

An English woman named Gentry, who lives in an Essex village, recently conducted an enlightening experiment concerning the multiplying capacity of a single grain of wheat. In March, 1909, she planted the grain on a bit of soil about a yard square and only a half-inch in depth to the granite sub-soil. In about three weeks a half dozen sprouts developed from this grain. Sprouts thus appearing were covered with earth again and again, until, by fall, the entire little plot was covered by the grass of wheat. This was allowed to rest throughout the winter, and the crop which resulted from it was harvested this summer. The result was 85 stalks of wheat, 20 bearing ears of large size, 50 of medium size, and 15 which were imperfectly developed. The entire number of grains was 2,800, averaging about medium quality. That is, in two seasons this single grain of wheat, under fairly favoring circumstances, had multiplied itself by 2,800; a rather striking example of readiness, on the part of the vegetable kingdom, to multiply and replenish the earth.

The Relentless Pharaoh Untombed

Exodus XIV, 27-28, says: "And Moses stretched forth his hand over the sea, and the sea returned to his strength when the morning appeared; and the Egyptians fled against it; and the Lord overthrew the Egyptians in the midst of the sea. And the waters returned, and covered the chariots, and the horsemen, and all the host of Pharaoh that came into the sea after them: there remained not so much as one of them." Let it be noted that the quotation nowhere says that Pharaoh was with his host, or that he was drowned. It is well to heed this fact, for otherwise those who had formed the unjustifiable impression that this Pharaoh was drowned with his host might be shocked to learn that his body recently was found in its tomb in the Valley of the Royal Tombs, Egypt. All authorities are agreed that the Pharaoh whose troops pursued the Israelites, was Seti-Mer-en-Phtah, more usually known as Menephtah, and this is the ruler whose mummy has recently been discovered and is now in the Cairo museum. The body was so well preserved that it was evident that Menephtah had died a natural death. The royal remains were discovered by a Frenchman named Lovet. It appears, then, that the modern rule probably applied in the olden time: Royalty and influential leaders were not likely to be found on the danger line; that was the place for clay less fine and blood less blue.

Training After-Dinner Speakers

A club recently organized in London not only should be encouraged there but should serve as a precedent in establishing similar clubs in many places. It is known as the Public Speaking Club of Great Britain, and its raison d'être is the training of after-dinner speakers. Everybody knows, and has suffered under, the variety of speaker the club has in mind—the variety that bores, and bores, and bores, and never strikes anything. In the first place, it proposes to make its pupil speak in the dark, lights gradually being turned on; secondly, he must speak in concert with others, who gradually will leave him to "go it alone;" thirdly, a bell will be rung whenever he begins to bore. This seems like heroic treatment, but sooner or later the club will ascertain that it will not avail in that large proportion of instances in which the real difficulty with the speaker is that he has nothing to say. In the final analysis that is what ails most after-dinner speakers, and nothing will cure their ailment. Still, if the club preserves a few grains of wheat out of some bushels of chaff it will do a good work.

Should Flying Over Cities Be Prohibited?

At a recent meeting of the Aero Club of France, which was held in Paris, a question was discussed which, as aviation progresses, is likely to become of great public importance eventually, viz: Should flying over cities be prohibited? Ninety-one aviators were present, and of these 64 were in favor of prohibition of such riding on the ground that it is dangerous to the inhabitants. Two were absolutely opposed to such prohibition, and 25 were in favor of permitting aviators to fly over cities provided they fly high enough to permit them to glide beyond the city in the event that the motor cease to work. Summing up, it will be seen that more than 70 per cent of these professional aviators are entirely opposed to permitting flying over cities, over 27 per cent favor it only under restrictions tending to public safety, and but a little more than two per cent favor it without restriction. This being the feeling among experts, there appears to be little room for doubt concerning what law relating to this matter the public must have when aviation has become a commonplace achievement: Flying over cities must be absolutely prohibited.

When Capital Won Out

In the prolonged strife between Capital and Labor Capital "won out," the other day, in the village of St. Pierre d'Oleron, France. It came to pass in this way: The washerwomen went on strike, and sent the town crier abroad with the announcement that henceforth their charge for labor would be thirty cents and meals per day. Straightway the women of the town responded that they would pay this higher wage only on condition that a day, run from 7 a. m. to 6 p. m., that no linen be brought to patrons' houses to be washed, and that coffee be not included with meals. The washerwomen replied—through the crier again—that they now had raised the price to 35 cents and meals, adding, "Those who wish to keep clean will employ us at that price; those who do not wish to be begged to do their own washing." Then the town crier took a vacation, while the women of the village bent above their own wash-tubs. The washerwomen were left without a vocation, and it required but a few days of that condition before the crier again was sent out. "Ladies," he cried, "the washerwomen of St. Pierre have decided after reflection to continue day work on the old terms, 20 cents a day, with meals and coffee." The battle had been fought, and lost. And yet, if one pauses to reflect, 30 cents a day would not seem like a serious overcharge in our land of the free and home of the brave, even with meals and coffee included.

The Blue Rose Here at Last

For a long time floricultural experts have been endeavoring to evolve a blue rose, but their efforts heretofore have been in vain. They did, indeed, sometimes grow a rose which was more or less blue, but unfortunately it did not retain its color, or, if it did, its scions did not. Now, however, one Alfred Smith, of Downley, England, has raised the long anticipated blue rose, and his experiments with it lead him, and other floriculturists, to believe that its color is "fast." Already he has received orders for it from countries so far apart as California, New York, the Netherlands and South Africa. Mr. Smith's bushes have bloomed most satisfactorily during the season just closed, and the budding operations appear to have been attended with success.

Monarchs Who Are Linguists

Speak not in wholesale derogation of kings; look not down upon them with too universal scorn merely because you happen to be an American citizen. Whatever their gross defects, and whatever your advantage as a citizen of a republic over them, it is probable that they have you "beaten several blocks" as a linguist. For instance, how would you like to compete at a talkfest with Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria, who talks German, French, Hungarian, Czech, Polish, Serbian, Croatian, Ruthenian, Dalmatian, Rumanian, Italian and Hebrew, besides speaking English and Latin less perfectly? Of course, he is only a monarch, but the advantage would be his at the fest. Then there is the Kaiser, who speaks German, English, French, Latin, Polish and Russian; Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria, who is at home in Bulgarian, English, French, German and Russian. In a general way, it may be said that nearly every European monarch speaks somewhere from three to fifteen languages. Democratic scorn for kings should be guardedly expressed; they can return it in so many varieties of speech as to make just one variety seem ineffective and futile.

Governmental Aid For Salvation Army

The Salvation Army, which is instant in season and out of season in all good works, in recent years has devoted some attention to importing girls into Canada for domestic service. So useful has this work proven that last year the Canadian legislature donated $20,000 to the army to assist in the enterprise, and so good have been the results that it is expected that this year a further $25,000 will be voted for the same purpose. The army maintains a home for the girl immigrants until they have been successfully and satisfactorily placed at service.

IMPROVED METHODS IN EXPOSITION BUILDING

By Elmer Ellsworth Carey

If we are to have an international exposition to commemorate the opening of the big ditch, why not depart from stereotyped methods and build the fair city according to progressive ideas? Usually millions are spent in building driveways, scenic effects, electric fountains, etc., and after the close of the exposition very little remains of permanent utility. The Panama Exposition will doubtless be located in Golden Gate Park, the logical place for such a creation; why not plan the exposition city and so construct it that all the scenic gardening, all the boulevards, irrigation and lighting systems, the fountains, statues, archways, the 750-foot grand central steel tower, the main building, the art building and all the state and government buildings—why not plan to have all these improvements and structures remain as a permanent show place?

The great objection to the ordinary exposition is that it is too large, too diffuse with monotonous repetitions; at St. Louis gigantic proportions were desired, and the exposition was top heavy. A better plan is to build fewer buildings but to make part of them permanent structures; the plans should be so drawn that the temporary structures could be removed at the close of the fair and replaced by lawns and gardens while the remaining improvements would harmonize and form a valuable addition to Golden Gate Park. An amusement city would result which, being under municipal control, would be free from objectionable features, and Golden Gate Park would have no equal as a pleasure ground. If this plan is carried out, San Francisco will fall heir to permanent and beautiful park improvements that could not be duplicated for $5,000,000; there would be a new park created; it would contain playgrounds, gymnasiums, museums, art galleries, aviation grounds, industrial displays, foreign and state exhibits, underground aquariums, zoological and botanical gardens, an emergency hospital, rest rooms, lakes, post-office, amusement devices by the score, band stands, theatres, and over all would gracefully stand the immense circular and spiral steel tower, nearly 1,000 feet high, which would contain searchlights, wireless station, a marine observatory, a weather station, and which would be one of the wonders of the age. A $5,000,000 improvement in Golden Gate Park is not to be waved lightly aside; such an improvement would add millions of dollars to the value of adjacent real estate. Our beautiful park would become a perpetual exposition which would draw thousands of visitors from the west, and add largely to our week-end visitors from nearby cities.

Hudson Maxim's "Science of Poetry"

It was scarcely to have been anticipated that the inventor of smokeless powder and various of the appurtenances of war would write a book, and a large book, on "The Science of Poetry and the Philosophy of Language." Withal, he has done it interestingly and, if not always profoundly, with so evident belief in himself and his conclusions that one will be inclined to read twice before differing with him.

"Poetry," says Mr. Maxim, "is the expression of insensuous thought in sensuous terms by artistic trope," and this, he contends, is the best definition of poetry ever given. Such a contention may not strike the reader as characterized by humility, but the author-inventor at no time pauses to bow before the shrine of humility. If he feels so disposed, there is no name so sacred in literature that he hesitates to take a fall out of its bearer. It really is both interesting and amusing to note how the great names of literature are pierced by his lance. There is none so rich in public honor that he nevertheless does him reverence. By example, he shows us how Milton should have improved his epics, he criticizes Shakespeare, he leaves Herbert Spencer but a shadowy guise of philosophy, and so he goes through a long and notable list.

But let no one make the mistake of presuming that the book is not interesting and entertaining, however its instructiveness may be viewed. Indeed, it probably is the more interesting because it is erratic. Withal, Mr. Maxim demonstrates that he writes a fair quality of verse himself, and in his list of great lines are many that really are great. The book repays reading, whether the reader be greatly benefited or not.

"Pathway to Western Literature"

A little book which should be decidedly useful in the public schools of California and other Pacific coast states is "Pathway to Western Literature." It is a compilation in prose and verse, by Nettie S. Gaines, of some of the best work of distinctively western writers, and the choice of selections has been made with excellent judgment. Some of the selections are known to practically everybody who reads; others, although less known, perhaps are not less creditable samples of the work done by western writers. There is a brief introduction by George Wharton James, the well known litterateur. As has been suggested, the book should be both useful and valuable in the work of our public schools.

"The Devil's Rebellion"

"The Devil's Rebellion, and the Reason Why," of which Chas. F. May is the author, is a unique book. It is so extremely unique that a fairly wide course of reading has given this reviewer knowledge of no other book that is at all like it. It is partly allegorical and partly argumentative, partly prose and partly verse, but through this wealth of variety the author vigorously maintains his tenets, which are:

This earth is the "nursery of the universe;"
The center of the earth is the literal fire-and-brimstone hell;

Part of Satan's rebellious host already is confined in this hell;

Satan himself and another part of his evil soldiery still are at large and setting snares for the unwary feet of the children of men;

In the end he, all of his host and a large percentage of men, women and children will be bound in the hell within this earth.

With liberal scriptural quotations and much energetic purpose, the author insists upon the justification of his views, and apparently it is at the penalty of finding the center of the earth that one differs with him.

This is but a brief review, but it is hoped that it has made clear the fact that the book is very unusual.

ABOUT PEOPLE

Stewart Edward White, the author, and his wife sailed recently from New York on the White Star liner Celtic. They go to spend a year in Equatorial Africa. Mrs. White has accompanied her novelist husband into wilds of the Sierra Mountains where it is said no other white woman has been, and she said she felt qualified to share his hardships and dangers in the wilds of Africa. Mr. White said his chief purpose was to study a race there which, he says, is not of the negro family, but corresponds to the American Indian. Before starting on their journey into the interior of the country Mr. and Mrs. White will be joined by John B. Martin of Santa Barbara and R. B. Barnhart of Grand Rapids, Mich.

Madame Olive Fremstad, who will open the New York opera season with Gluck's "Armide," is a good cook, and prepares many of her own meals as a relief from hotel fare.

Maurice Maeterlinck, the Belgian poet who writes mainly in French, has received the offer of a seat in the French Academy, the highest honor in the gift of the French people. Maeterlinck is now torn between patriotism and ambition. To accept the seat he must renounce his Belgian citizenship and become a subject of France. He has not yet decided what to do.

"There is just one rule for successful play-writing," says W. Somerset Maugham, author of "Smith," "Mrs. Dot" and many other comedies. "That is to keep on trying. And I am giving my own recipe."

Gabriele d'Annunzio proposes, it is said, writing a play with mermaids, tritons and fishes swimming the waters of the sea. Among the characters will be lobsters, star fish, octopi, whales and crabs. D'Annunzio got his idea, it is said, from Gordon Craig's theories and inventions for stage lighting and effects.

Miss Agnes Deans Cameron has just returned from a journey of 20,000 miles in the interests of the Canadian government. Her trip took her to the edge of the Arctic ocean at a point where a white woman had never before been seen by the natives.

Californian Poets' Corner

YUMA

By Charles H. Phelps

Weary, weary, desolate,
Sand-swept, parched and cursed of fate;
Burning, but how passionless!
Barren, bald and pitiless!

Through all ages fateful moons
Glared upon thy whited dunes

And malignant, wrathful suns
Fiercely drank the streamless runs

So that nature's only tune
Is the blare of the simoon
Piercing burn'd unweeping skies
With its awful monodies.

Not a flower lifts its head
Where the emigrant lies dead.

Not a living creature calls
Where the Gila monster crawls,
Hot and hideous as the sun
To the dead man's skeleton

But the desert and the dead,
And the hot hell overhead,
And the blazing, seething air,
And the dread mirage are there.

OF MECHANICAL AIDS TO WRITING

The English novelist, W. J. Locke, recently told an American interviewer that he never used a typewriter nor employed a stenographer. The statement seems to have caused some mild surprise. Mr. Locke's explanation is so illuminating that it is worthy thoughtful attention. He said that, as he considers 300 words a good hour's work, and as he can easily write them down in fifteen minutes, he feels no need of time-saving or labor-saving devices. The pen is sufficient.

In other words, literature is a product of thought, and men do not think with machines or arms or legs. Blind Milton, dependent upon an ignorant amanuensis, produced a vast bulk of writings without touching pen to paper. He felt this to be a handicap, as indeed it was, and the effect is plainly visible in his writings, for after his loss of sight they assume the grandiose style of a forum declaimer and lose much of the lithe grace and easy movement of his earlier songs.

Mechanical contrivances really are a hindrance to good writing. They interpose an added barrier between the writer's thought and its commission to paper, which is a genuine affliction to a man whose nervous organization is so sensitive as that of a good writer. The noise of a typewriter, for example, is an irritation, disturbing the tranquil stream of his idea. And, further, its intricate mechanism is a half-sentient something, out of touch with the writer's spirit, as troublesome to him as the presence in the room of an offensive stranger. Its very precision, too, is a bar to its usefulness. Poetry and prose both have their rhythm, and rhythm has its relation to mathematics, but not to the mathematical and mechanical precision of machinery. The writer feeds upon suggestions, variety, mutabilities, flashes of beauty, change, all qualities of Nature unmarked by the hand of man. A typewriter suggests other things, the shop, the noise of industry, the dust and sweat of prosaic commerce.

And then, as Mr. Locke says, there is no need for time-saving devices in the art of writing. Man's thought travels fast, but orderly thought, in such form as a writer can use, moves slowly to organized expression, much more slowly than even an indifferent penman writes. Some may object and cite the improvisatory nature of some writing, but genuine improvisation is rare, is always extremely brief, and is then only the sudden expression of an idea slowly crystallized by long previous thought. The good writer constantly surprises himself by writing better than he expected, because his best thought sometimes operates unconsciously and flowers in spontaneous and brilliant beauty. And just as often he is surprised to find that his consciously ordered thoughts fall dead upon the paper, perfect in form but lifeless as dead clay.

It is a curious fact, worthy study, that the multiplication of mechanical aids to writing has multiplied the number of men who write readable matter, but has not at all multiplied the number of writers whose works live. The answer is not far to seek. Literature is a product of great thoughts, great emotions, and a mastery of language. Machinery has no relation to these things except as means of distribution. They substitute the multiple press for the hand press, but they do not help create great books. Their haste is an aid to the publisher, but they have already led many writers to attempt feats of execution that are incompatible with good writing, and have deluded the public into a strange fallacy that, because books can be printed faster and cheaper, or manuscripts typewritten or dictated instead of being written by hand, genius can adopt a swifter pace and produce good work to match the speed of the machine.

A PLEA FOR ENJOYMENT

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

How many people do you know who ever take a long walk simply because they enjoy it? I know any number who religiously trudge so many miles a week, but they do it from a grim sense of duty, because it is "healthful," because it will "make them fit" for next week's work. I know others who sometimes do it because it is "the thing"—a fashion. But I know mighty few that ever irresponsibly say, "By George, I feel like taking a long walk today. Let's be off!"

No, indeed. Most of us insist upon attaching a value to every act of life. We refuse to do anything that will not bring us returns—either in money, in health, or in the satisfaction of having done good to somebody. My plea is for enjoyment because it is enjoyment, pleasure for pleasure's own sweet sake. You may protest that this is a waste of time. As you will, so be it. A waste of time, a plunge into irresponsibility, a consumption of time without purpose, a vacuous employment.

Accepting all these body blows, I yet plead for some few intervals of life in which we may escape the grim angel Duty, may elude the haunting nightmare of Conscience. As a nation, almost as a race, we have forgotten how to enjoy. The man who can employ his annual vacation of two weeks to obtain pure enjoyment is growing rarer. He is well-nigh extinct. He feels, instead, the urgent need of rebuilding worn-out tissue, of repairing his nervous organization—he wants to do something with his time which will do him some good. So he adopts for his vacation a regimen that is as calculated as a doctor's prescription, and, metaphorically speaking, feverishly proceeds to angle so many hours a day, with a rod in one hand and a thermometer in the other, taking fish off the hook one minute and the next seeing if his temperature is normal—seeing if the vacation is doing him good and, if good, whether enough good to be worth the investment of time and money expended in taking the vacation.

Now, I admit, this gentleman is doing a laudable thing, it may be even a necessary thing, but he is the victim of a fallacy in conceiving it as enjoyment. It is not: it is open-air work, or therapeutic work, but it is not joy. But, I hear you protest, what is the use of mere joy? My dear fellow, the answer is—the use of joy is joy. I know you can't understand it: I can see your bewildered countenance: I can hear you grumble again, what's the use? Well, if you must have it, there is no use—just joy. I refuse to translate that gossamer tissue into your sordid language of gain, even if you count the gain in health, nay, even if you count it in souls. I am for some unadulterated joy—not too much, there's tummy-aches and headaches and wantonness in that—but some, I demand some. Some joy unmingled with hope of reward, some joy without counting the cost.

Well, I hear you rejoin, since you must have the darned stuff, define it, show us a sample, give us a taste, tell us what you are talking about. We can understand the joy of a dollar saved or a dollar earned; we can understand the joy of increased knowledge or gain in the ability to appreciate music or art; we know the joy of returning strength and vitality; we even sense the joy of self-sacrifice, of doing good to others. But just joy—nonsense!

Not so soon, my dear fellow. You can't stump me there. I don't pretend I can define it, but illustrate it I can. Only yesterday I read of a man in Paris who did what the man who wrote him up thought was a very fond thing: It seems an old banker had died, and among his effects were found cabinets containing thousands on thousands of—what d'ye suppose? Cigar bands. Yes, sir, neatly arranged, classified, sub-classified, housed under glass, cherished like relics. His heirs looked at those cabinets and thought exactly what you think: "Crazy," and "what are they worth?"

Well, the old man wasn't there any more to defend himself on the lunacy charge, so I'll have to do that. As to what they were worth, the heirs soon found out—$2.50 the auctioneer got. But the crazy part is what interests me, and what illustrates—understand, I say "illustrates," not "comprehends"—my idea of joy. The dear old banker wasn't crazy at all. He knew how to make money; he did make money; he made it right up to his death—and, God knows, if a man who can make money isn't sane, who'll get the credit for sense anywhere in this age? That's conclusive, or all modern logic must fall. So the old man was sane.

But why, then, did he go on, year after year, gathering these absurd cigar bands, and wasting his time and his eyesight sorting them over, arranging them, buying cabinets to store them? My dear fellow, the answer is easy, but I know it will stun you: He enjoyed it!

But, you protest, the thing is so palpably absurd, so silly, so wasteful, so useless. Exactly, my dear fellow, you hit it exactly. It was silly, absurd, wasteful, and it was useless. But those adjectives are like the flowers that bloom in the spring, tra-la—they have nothing to do with the case. I don't care what adjectives you apply to the old banker's actions, you may shovel the whole dictionary on them if you like. What I said was—and to that, and that only, I stick—he enjoyed it. Leave me the word "enjoy" and you and your Webster go hang. Leave me and my banker alone. I assert that he may collect cigar bands till Gabriel's trump and be saner and richer in experience than you, who cannot understand, because you cannot see any "use" in it. And I insist that I may miss a chance to make millions for the sake of cutting out paper dolls, if I like—which I don't, by the way—and still have something that you never had and never will have.

Now don't misconstrue me. I do not urge you, my grave San Francisco banker, nor you, my weighty Los Angeles judge, to cut out paper dolls. But I would urge upon you that sometime you forget that there is a standard of values in the world, that at odd moments you forget that there is such a thing as money, time, fitness of things, and then yield yourself up wholly, unconsciously, joyously to some thing that will return you nothing but itself, expressible only as joy.

I recall two incidents that will illustrate, in another way, my meaning. One day, as I walked down the street in a country town, I saw a small boy roosting high on a fence-post, gazing off into space. Though I passed directly across his line of vision, his eyes did not move. He was in a brown study. And I knew by the light in his eyes and the whimsical smile on his face that that urchin was dreaming of something wonderfully, absorbingly attractive, something that shut out every other thought from his mind and all motion from his body, something that filled him with foolish but unspeakable joy. That was years ago, but the thought of that boy's face haunts me yet. I would give more than I can afford to know what he was thinking about. Why? Because it might be of some use? Impossible! No, because I have envied him to this day that futile but transcendent bit of enjoyment.

The other incident will show you the other side. I met a group of children gathering flowers in a country field. With them ambled a benignant lady. On questioning her I learned that she had brought them out from school for this frolic. How charming, I exclaimed, how I would have enjoyed such an unexpected vacation when I was a tad in school. "Sh!" she replied, "it's not a vacation. This is a nature-study class. When we gather at school tomorrow I will tell them the meaning and use of all these flowers we are gathering." I shuddered and went away. Poor children, I thought, how sad. God be with you, little ones, in your enjoyment, and cloy not this day, for tomorrow, forsooth, teacher is going to tell you that this was not a vacation at all, not a riotous carefree largess of happiness, with no aim to seek but unexpected joy, but rather she will deceive you, will shatter this iridescent dream of unearned pleasure by telling you that you were on a scientific expedition, that the day had a "purpose," that the flowers have "uses," and that your poor little minds and bodies have had some "good" done to them. Now isn't that pitifully sad?

I should like to have seen the expression on Shakespeare's face when some Elizabethan bluestocking asked him what his "purpose" was in writing "Romeo and Juliet." I should like to have been out of reach of Michael Angelo's mallet when a Chautauquan lecturer asked him what was the "use" of carving his David or his Moses. I should have enjoyed beyond expression hearing Eugene Field swear when somebody asked him, when they found him making mud pies with the street gamins' and forgetful of his wedding hour, if he thought mud baths were "good" for him.

So again I plead for enjoyment without thought of use or purpose or gain, enjoyment shiftless, if you please, idle, indolent, reckless of consequences. Robert Louis Stevenson, in his later years, nightly and devoutly prayed that he might retain this capacity. And a San Franciscan, Bruce Porter, has cried out in verse for this gift of incorruptible and deathless youth, in his lines:

"Still to be sure of the dawn,
Still to be glad for the sea,
Still to know fire of the blood—
God keep these gifts in me.

"Then I shall vanquish the dark,
Then I shall breast the redoubt,
Then I shall glory the Lord,
And go down to the grave with a shout."

PERSONALIA

Miss Flora Wilson, daughter of the secretary of agriculture, who is to sing at the Republican mass-meetings in Iowa, where her father is to speak, is a pupil of Jean de Reszke. Miss Wilson is a painter and a writer as well as a coloratura soprano.

Far into the wilderness of western Labrador, where no white man is known to have trod before, Prof. Raymond McFarland, of Middlebury College, has traveled in a canoe along rivers and lakes and on foot through forests and over mountains during the last two months. On part of his journey he was accompanied by Profs. Thomas C. Brown and Phelps N. Sweet, also of Middlebury College.

Miss Frances A. Keller, who has been appointed chief investigator in the New York state labor department, has made an extensive study of criminology and is well informed in law. She will receive a salary of $2,500, all of which she intends to give to the department to pay for further development of the bureau. She was a member of Gov. Hughes's special immigration commission, appointed in 1908, and the report she made on the conclusion of that service had considerable influence.

The report is abroad that former president Castro, of Venezuela, is following the present revolutionary movement in his country from the security of a little inn in Teneriffe, in the Canary Islands, hoping for a turn of fortune auspicious for his return to power in Venezuela.

Mrs. Catherine Waugh McCulloch, one of the most enthusiastic of Chicago's woman suffragists, recently caused disappointment among her friends in the movement by refusing to accept the nomination for state senator from the sixth senatorial district. She said she would refuse any political honor other than re-election as justice of the peace in Evanston. The argument upon which she based her refusal of the nomination was that a woman with four children must keep her place in her home, which she would not be able to do as a senatorial nominee.

The popularity of Premier Laurier of Canada is again attested by the fact that the magnificent hotel now being erected in Ottawa by the Grand Trunk Railway, at a cost of a million and a half dollars, is to be called Chateau Laurier.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

The Pauper and His Brother

Room! Give me room! My grief is my own;
Why should you scan it with curious eye?
For the pauper who tramps and the king on his throne.

Each has place by his loved when they die.
"Only a hobo!" You said it—I heard
But distinctions are naught at the gate of a tomb.
So why should I start at the scorn in a word?
I, too, am a pauper, yet—Room! Give me room!

He was my brother. A dubious pair?
Doubtless; no doubt! Still, my brother was he.
And one mother for us has whispered her prayer—
Oh, long, long ago—as we knelt by her knee.

Give no heed to my tears. A pauper's they are.

A pauper's? A hobo's!—You said it, you know.—
And what is his wound, or what is his scar,
That you should take note of the signs of his woe?

I think if our mother had lived—But she died.
And we two were left in our half-babyhood
To cope with the world, which a stronger had tried.

To fall if we must, or to stand if we could.
And what if we fell? There was no one to heed.

And no one to care; that is, none of you.
Whom hearts of affection have taught to succeed.

We lifted each other—'twas all we could do.

And of course we went wrong. Suppose that your child,

The babe that you kissed as he sat on your
knee,

Had no one to lead him from ways that are wild,

No pilot to guide o'er life's uncharted sea—
Ah, you start at the thought, and you whisper,
"No, no!"

There's a prayer in your heart for your loved in the throng.

But my brother and I, in the morning's first glow,

With wee feet that stumbled, went forth—and went wrong.

None other cared for us, but love thus denied
From others we gave to each other in truth.
Full often we stumbled, but still side by side
We walked through the days of our desolate youth.

And then came the war. The bright southern sky

Was lurid, and riven by lightnings of death.
And "Hate" was the watchword, and "Kill"
was the cry.

And the winds bore the clamor of hell on their breath.

Then we drifted southward along with the rest;

Just drifted, not knowing what better to do.
Till I halted a time, with a hole in my breast,
And I judge I'd have died, but Jim pulled me through.

Then later—Antietam—his turn came to Jim.
I carried him, wounded, down red lanes of death;

I bore him to safety and looked after him.
Till he turned to the land where the living draw breath.

Then, after the war—what matters it now.

With Jim lying there, not heeding my pain?
That we meant for the best to the end I will vow,

But somehow we missed, and again, and again.

And then we lost heart. 'Tis an often told tale;

We struck the down grade that is oiled by mankind

For the crippled and halting who strive but to fail—

But why should I talk when there's no one to mind?

"Only a hobo!" You said it—I heard.

But, Jimmy, old boy, you lacked but a show.
I have looked in your heart, and it started and stirred

To the hopes and the dreams that the luckier know;

And perhaps, oh, perhaps, somewhere o'er the stars

There is One by whom failure to blessing is wed,

Who knows how we beat 'gainst life's fetters and bars—

And now, give me place, give me space, with my dead.

The Opinions of Rufus

Some folks never seem to realize that the main difference 'tween most men an' horses is that you can drive horses easier'n you can lead 'em.

Ever notice that you can read a hist'ry right erlong without once hearin' a thing 'bout any man that did nothin' but git rich?

Josh Bings says he wishes that every man that docks a horse's tail had to be baldheaded plum through every fly season.

Appearances ain't everything. Sometimes the homeliest signature on a check can draw the most money out of a bank.

Words can wear out a repytashun, an' middlin' often do, but they ain't a case on record where they've put a single scratch on character.

Seem' es there must be consider'ble pressure of business 'round the Narrer Gate, I can't help hopin' that when the hobble-skirt brigade gits there Saint Peter won't ask 'em to hurry up.

Somethin' more'n words is needed for poetry. It don't make throwin' things at the midnight cat that chants on the back fence any more poetical if you describe it 'es strivin' fer the unattainable.

"Waste not, want not,"—unless you don't happen to have getheered anything to waste.

I never see a man make much money by jest settin' 'round an' wishin' he had it.

'Tain't so certain that a bird in the hand's worth two in the bush. Wouldn't you prefer a turkey buzzard in the bush?

Bring up a child in the way he should go, an' he will be all right—unless, perhaps, he's too much like his pa an' ma.

The Patrickcalhoun and the Low Person

A certain Patrickcalhoun which had been engaged in developing Big Business by the Bribery Process, and was caught at it, necessitating the expenditure of Divers Ducats to purchase a bandage for the eyes of Majestic Law, delivered a Few Brief Remarks at a meeting of Sterling Sympathizers. It developed that his subject was The Odious Muckraker.

"Need I say," it Fewly and Briefly Remarked, "that I loathe, abhor the Despicable Muckraker? My very soul with strong disgust is stirred whenever I recall how he interferes with Big Business and its essential Boodling Operations. He is the bane of—"

"What do you understand by a Muckraker?"
inquired one of the Loathsome Proletariat, who, unknown to the Elect, had climbed up to the window and was looking in

For a moment the Patrickcalhoun hesi-tated, as if loath to answer one of the Common Mob, then, with evident disgust, it replied:

"A Muckraker, it should be unnecessary to say, is a Low Writer who tells the Obnoxious Truth without using any Whitewash on the job."

What farther he said was lost in the Roar of Applause with which his definition was greeted.

"The Warm Tides of the Pacific"

Why do we of California, who have almost all of blessing and charm that kindly Mother Nature bestows upon her children—why do we, when we advertise our glories abroad, not content ourselves with enumeration of the bounties which actually are ours, so frequently adding a few picturesque touches to which we are not entitled? Is it not enough to possess attractions and advantages which set us apart as supremely blessed among earth's habitants? Must we also purloin a few?

The foregoing questions have been suggested by a promotion article which mentions, among other Californian lures, "the warm tides of the Pacific." Think of it! The w-w-w-warm t-t-t-tides of the P-p-p-pacific!

I recall with easily subdued pleasure the first time I ever came in contact with the warm tides of the Pacific. We had come through hot and dusty New Mexico and Arizona and over the still hotter and more dusty Mojave desert, and, arriving at Coronado Beach, which then was but a vague promise of its present self, we looked with pleasure-able anticipation upon the blue waves which broke in ripples before our feet. Spurred on by the inspiring thought of the joy awaiting me, I donned my bathing-suit and plunged into
"the warm tides of the Pacific."

I plunged out again. Cold! My teeth chatter yet when I think of that first immersion in the warm tides of the Pacific. My friends rubbed me down and got me to a fire as soon as possible, but it was a close call.

The tides of the Pacific along the Californian coast are not warm; they are cold, as the Japan current is cold wherever it touches;
they are colder than the tides along our eastern coast, and those are not superheated. We may as well, or better, be honest about it.
We have wealth-producing soil, marvelous climate, unsurpassed scenery, rare natural riches, but warm tides are not numbered among our blessings. Let's look the fact in the face, and admit it. We need no banner of false pretenses; let's pull it down

I Have Noticed That—

We may regret the foolish or bad thing we have done, but there is no way of doing it over again.

A bright chap does not necessarily have a cinch on the world's prizes. There are several other bright fellows in the competition.

"Money makes the mare go," but sometimes the poor old creature drags a hearse.

When we become well acquainted with some men that have very little money we find out that they are about the richest people in the community.

Some people hardly ever fall, because they don't get high enough to do so.

When we attempt to go from preaching brotherly love to acting it we sometimes find that we have a long distance to travel.

We may consider that Capital or Labor is abused, as we please, but it is not Labor that owns a yacht or a summer home at the seaside.

Our sympathy for our neighbor in his sick-we feel that his should be for us when we are ill.

We can fool our wives some of the time, but the man who goes on the theory that he can fool his all of the time is likely to get left

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Unkindly Fate's Severest Blow

It was a hard blow which unkindly fate dealt a progressive Republicanism when, on Saturday last, the physician in charge, with stethoscope at his patient's chest counting the heartbeats, counted Jonathan Dolliver out. He was too young a man to be called to his rest, being only in his fifty-third year. He was precocious, graduating from the West Virginia university at seventeen and admitted to the bar at twenty years of age. He spent twelve years in the House of Representatives from Iowa and has been nearly ten years in the United States senate. He was perhaps the strongest man in the insurgent Republican ranks at the capital of the nation, always sane, clear headed, soundly rather than radically progressive, able and willing to strike hard blows for a free party and a free country. His death is a severe blow to the cause of progress within the Republican party, but, while it may stagger it, it will not stop it. Nothing can.

The Cat Is Out

The Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, it lay low and say little, but it is not asleep. It is taking a hand in this campaign. Week before last there was a quiet conference of railroad machine men from all over the state, so quiet that they slipped into town and out again without letting the newspaper boys hear of it, but immediately thereafter word was passed out that, "It is Bell." The reason why is that "Johnson is too radical." "We are afraid of him." Within a few days thereafter George A. Knight who, a few weeks ago was reported as turning the cold shoulder upon the whole Southern Pacific Political Bureau, came out against Johnson. The unspeakable Post-Globe, of San Francisco, espoused the Bell cause and the Oakland Tribune began to show signs of defection. The Watchman does not hold Mr. Bell responsible for this renewal of hostilities against Mr. Johnson by Mr. Herrin and his associates. It is a perfectly natural thing for Mr. Herrin to do. He would be less than human if he did not resent being made the pivot of the campaign. Nevertheless he is the pivot and if he manages to secure the defeat of Johnson and the election of Bell he will have a hold on Mr. Bell that he will find it extremely difficult wholly to shake off. No man ever understood politics better than the late and unlamented Thomas C. Platt and he declared it impossible for any man to resist the forces that put him in office. Mr. Bell cannot.

Johnson's Radicalism

"Hiram Johnson is too radical." "We are afraid of him," is the word passed out to all whom the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company hope to influence to vote for Theodore Bell. In what does that radicalism consist? In what particular is Theodore Bell less radical? Mr. Bell has affirmed at every address that he will do the railroads no injustice. Mr. Johnson has merely said that he does not have to worry about that; that the Southern Pacific is abundantly able to look out for its own interests, and that what he is most concerned for is to secure justice for the shippers and the people. That is the fight. The burden of Mr. Johnson's promise to the people is that he "will kick Mr. W. F. Herrin and the Southern Pacific Company out of the government of California as they have been kicked out of the Republican party in California." No doubt that seems to Mr. Herrin to be a very radical proceeding, but will Mr. Bell's treatment of Mr. Herrin be any less radical? Will Mr. Bell be content to kick Mr. Herrin part way out of the government of California? Will he merely invite him out? Will he usher him out gently and with decorum or will he permit him to stay in on promise of good behavior? Will he treat Mr. Herrin in a lady-like manner, or will he be aggressive and declare unto him that Southern Pacific manipulation and domination will not be tolerated? After all does not Mr. Johnson's radicalism consist mainly in telling explicitly what he will do in relation to Southern Pacific domination in language that everybody can understand? Mr. Johnson's explicitness would not ill become Mr. Bell.

Recriminations Are Regrettable

The Watchman regards it as unfortunate that anything in the nature of a "scrap" should take place between Mr. Johnson and Mr. Bell. They are both good men, both sincere men, both opposed to allowing Mr. Herrin and the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company any longer to rule this state. The rank and file of the followers of Mr. Bell are sincerely opposed and, in the Republican party of California, only those who have stood to gain something from the Herrin regime have wanted to see that regime continue. The ninety-and-nine Republicans out of the hundred heaved great sighs of relief when they saw their party emancipated, and the ninety and nine Democrats out of the hundred would have done the same under similar circumstances.

But as the hundredth man in the Republican party was willing to wear the Herrin collar and do the Herrin bidding for a chance at the fleshpots of the Southern Pacific Pharaoh, so the hundredth Democrat is equally willing to put on what the Republican thralls have cast off to the same end. Four years ago Mr. Bell's only chance of election lay in being radically anti-Herrin. This year his only chance lies in getting such Republican votes as Mr. Herrin can throw to him in revenge for Johnson's whipping him out of the Republican party. The position of the Democracy is not only trying to Mr. Bell, but trying to those of his followers who see a chance to get at the fleshpots from which savory smells already reach their olfactories. The situation is perfectly natural and politically inevitable and there is little reason to doubt that the voting public sees it and understands it perfectly. They will not vote with Mr. Herrin even for a candidate who, personally, challenges their good opinion.

The Bettor Bluffer

We have reached that stage of the pending election when the voice of the bettor is heard in the land. He is generally a bluffer and, whether he is or not, he does not know anything about how any election is going that anyone else may not know. Besides, he is merely betting how it will go, not how it should go. The honest man wants to know how he ought to vote. The bettor-bluffer cannot tell him and whoever can give the voter no light on that subject were better to keep his light under a bushel. He does not count.

William Kent On The Parcels Post

Mr. William Kent is another one of those impractical fellows who, while running for office, goes around saying things that no politic politician could be induced to say. For instance, he is advocating the parcels post idea to which local merchants are very generally, and very mistakenly, opposed. Here are a few figures not without interest in that connection. Number of rural routes in the United States, 40,000; monthly income per wagon, $14.92; monthly cost per wagon, $72.16; average load per wagon, 25 pounds; average load per express wagon, one and one-half tons. Now just let those rural delivery routes do a parcels post business and they will soon be able, not only to earn their own way, and remove an enormous postal deficit, but perform a most acceptable service to the patrons of the routes and stimulate local trade. Mr. Kent is on the right track and has the courage to stay there right through the campaign.

Are You Quite Fair, Mr. Theodore Bell?

At Marysville Wednesday night Theodore Bell said: "With Mr. Johnson's admissions before the people of the state any claim for credit for the work that he did on behalf of the graft prosecutions is disposed of. He simply gave his professional services in exchange for a fee as any other attorney would have done." Was that quite fair, Mr. Bell? Mr. Johnson gave a year to the prosecutions for a fee, a work that, however, involved giving up other business that was worth much more to him. Then he retired from the case to look after his private practice. Up to that time Mr. Bell's statement was true. But many months went by and Francis J. Heney was shot. He was then in the middle of the Ruef case. Hiram Johnson and Matthew I. Sullivan took up the case where Mr. Heney dropped it and prosecuted it to a final determination without any compensation whatever. For that Mr. Johnson is entitled to much credit, although he has not claimed any. He has, however, earned by that act the hatred of the whole pro-graft fraternity. Because of that patriotic service that entire fraternity is marshaled on the side of Theodore Bell, not that they love Bell, for his own standing on the graft issue was commendable, but because they hate Johnson the more. Is Mr. Bell quite fair in denying to Mr. Johnson all credit for disinterested service because he was paid for a part of that service? In his cooler moments we are very sure that Mr. Bell will regret an attitude so palpably unfair and ungenerous.

What Would Theo. Bell Have Done In His Place?

Mr. Bell has taken Mr. Johnson severely to task for having gotten J. Dalzell Brown off too easy for his part in wrecking the California Safe Deposit Company. Dalzell Brown got off far too easy. Eighteen years, rather than eighteen months, in prison for his crimes would better fit the needs of his case, but what would Mr. Bell have done had he, instead of Mr. Johnson, been retained for the defense of J. Dalzell Brown? Would he have done the best or the worst that he could for his client? Would he have gotten him off with eighteen months of imprisonment if he could or would he have insisted upon making it longer? To ask these questions is to answer them. Mr. Bell would have done all the things he lawfully could in aid of his client and that is all that Mr. Johnson did. The result was unfortunate, but the responsibility for that result rests with the prosecution and the court, not with the attorney for the defense, so long as the attorney for the defense packed no juries, made way with no witnesses, sought for no delays on frivolous pretexts and was guilty of no unprofessional conduct, and neither Mr. Bell nor his friends dare make any such accusations. This whole controversy between the two candidates is extremely regrettable. So far as Mr. Bell is concerned it is not only regrettable but unsound and unfair.

The Fight Is On Old Graft Lines

It will be many years before the shadow of San Francisco's great disgrace will pass from it. Perhaps it was too much to expect that the pending contest could be fought to a conclusion upon other than the old graft lines, and yet it should have been. Mr. Johnson fought the grafters as hard as he knew how and Mr. Bell was never favorable to them. Nevertheless, the contest, during its last weeks, is shaping around to old anti and pro graft lines. There are few, if any, who wished to see the grafters convicted and punished who are not supporting Johnson heartily. Per contra, nearly all of those who were on the side of the grafters have lined up on the side of Bell and the Democratic ticket. The Democratic management is doing nothing for the candidacy of Judge W. P. Lawlor, the sterling jurist before whom the grafters were tried and who resolutely resisted their efforts to break down the law and drag justice in the mire, but that committee is doing everything it can to aid the candidacy of Judge Bledsoe. The Sun, established to aid the cause of Democracy in California, has scarcely learned of the candidacy of Judge Lawlor. The Calhoun press is violently attacking Johnson and Lawlor, and even Mr. Bell himself has been betrayed into saying harsh things of the Lincoln-Roosevelt and Republican insurgent movement which is and was anti-graft. The Southern Pacific Political Bureau was actively on the side of the protection of the grafters and it is actively at work in support of Bell. All this may be more Mr. Bell's misfortune than his fault, but fact it is and one to be well considered before voting.

Where Democrats Deserve To Win

While the triumph of the Democratic party in California would prove a national calamity, in that it would be a repulse to a progressive Republicanism, in New Jersey the case stands exactly the other way. There the progressive Republicans were beaten at the primaries by the machine, as bad a machine as California ever had. Then the Democrats took up the fight that the progressives lost and nominated for governor Woodrow Wilson, a progressive conservative, a clean man on a good platform, and progressive Republicans should, and probably will, vote for him. Democratic success in New Jersey will mean a triumph for a progressive Republicanism just as certainly as Democratic success in California will mean a triumph for Republican reaction and stand-patism.

In Massachusetts the Democrats had another chance to vindicate the spirit of progress, but they turned their opportunity into a free-for-all fist fight for control of the state convention by the Boston toughs, and made a mess of the whole business.

OAKLAND'S WATERFRONT

By B. H. Pendleton

An article appeared in a recent issue of The California Weekly, entitled "Oakland's Waterfront Crisis," by Mr. Henry C. McPike. This article is an able presentation from the viewpoint of those opposed to the granting of the franchise to the Southern Pacific Company, which comes up for final passage in the city council in a few days. The article, however, is thoroughly partisan and an ex-parte statement. It does not pretend to present but one aspect of the question. In order that your readers may understand the point of view of a member of the city council, I would request you to give publicity to the following statement.

Mr. McPike, in giving a list of the advantages to be derived by the city of Oakland, neglected the most important concession insisted upon by the council, viz: the reversion of the entire Southern Pacific mole to the city of Oakland at the expiration of the term of the franchise, without which concession the franchise would not have been considered. Mr. McPike made no mention of the very valuable interchange switching privileges on the mole accorded the Oakland industries.

Rental Comparison Unfair

He compared the rental of $125 per month which it is proposed to exact for the wharfing-out privilege to the rental of $8,000 per month which is paid by the Southern Pacific Company for the use of the Ferry building in San Francisco, a manifestly unfair comparison when it is considered that, in San Francisco, the railroad company has the use of an expensive terminal building in immediate juxtaposition to a large city, whereas on the other side of the bay they are required at their own expense to erect structures on a mole which they themselves were obliged to build at an expenditure of many millions of dollars; a comparison that is more unfair when it is considered that the city makes no claim to any of the land in question but only to the privilege of wharfing-out.

Mr. McPike maintains that the wharf at the foot of Broadway which the Southern Pacific proposes to turn over to the city is not in truth their property. The fact is that the property has been in litigation for fourteen years with the Southern Pacific in possession. This settlement ends litigation, with Oakland in possession.

Mr. McPike states that it is another gratuity on the part of the railroad to remove Long Wharf. The city insisted on it not as a gratuity but as a necessity to gain freer access to the 6,600 feet of water front which the city controls between the Key Route and the Southern Pacific moles.

Mr. McPike characterizes the opening of a street one-half mile long and eighty feet wide through the yards of the Southern Pacific Company as a "singular" proposition. We hope it will be considered by others as a wise provision to give access to the city's holdings. As a side light upon the care with which all of the provisions of this franchise have been worked out, the railroad company was required to reduce the number of its tracks crossing the proposed street from thirteen now in use to five.

Mr. McPike's ideas of the Broadway harbor line change have been taken under careful advisement, but, as this is purely an engineering matter, we have been guided by our engineers.

The Stratton Patent

It would be interesting to know the sources of Mr. McPike's information which leads him to state that the holdings of the railroad company under the Stratton patent are less than two acres in extent. The facts are that the railroad company possess 17½ acres of land in the Stratton patent and that they propose to turn over to the city a tract of land between Seventh and First streets lying west of Fifth avenue, to the waterway of some 7½ acres in extent.

In advocating the passage of this ordinance to print I offered the following exposition of the case:

Present Control of Waterfront

The western waterfront, measured along the bulkhead line, is approximately 11,000 feet in length divided as follows: on the north, the Key with 1,000 feet; then a strip 6,600 feet between the Key and the mole controlled by the city; then the proposed 2,200 feet to the Southern Pacific Company; then 1,085 feet controlled by the city and lastly the Western Pacific with 1,300 feet. Not only has the city the two waterfront reservations aggregating 7,685 feet, but it has provided ready access thereto by opening three streets to the key basin and a roadway 80 feet wide to the 1,085 foot strip of waterfront lying between the Southern Pacific and Western Pacific moles. Furthermore, in order to enable any competing railroad to obtain access to the waterfront a provision was made that it might have right-of-way along and over the 80 foot street. To grant the proposed franchise to the Southern Pacific of a fifth of the waterfront is not granting a monopoly; on the contrary, not to grant it is manifestly a discrimination in favor of the Western Pacific and the Key.

The city has no claim and makes no claim of title in fee to a foot of land on the western waterfront. All the land lying shoreward from the low tide line in the territory adjoining the proposed franchise has been confirmed to the Southern Pacific by decision of the State Supreme Court. Oakland's vital and living interest in the matter is that under the decision of the United States courts it does possess the wharfing-out privileges from the low tide line.

A Mandatory Vote

Some two years ago a charter amendment was proposed to the people permitting the city council to grant to the Southern Pacific Company a franchise for fifty years in the territory defined "without discrimination" as to the other corporations. This amendment was carried and, as a referendum, should be interpreted as mandatory rather than permissive. The resolution to grant the franchise was introduced some two months ago and has been given most careful consideration by the council committees since that time. The first act of the committee was to insert in the franchise a reversion clause under the terms of which the mole, docks, etc., became the absolute property of Oakland at the termination of the franchise. Inasmuch as the Southern Pacific will probably have expended three or four million dollars on this property which it is proposed to turn over to the city it very naturally objected. The clause was, however, inserted and the Southern Pacific has acquiesced.

It was further stipulated that the superstructures on the mole, such as depots, warehouses, etc., should become the property of the city at the expiration of the leasehold upon payment by the city to the Southern Pacific of a sum to be fixed by appraisers.

Pursuant to suggestions from the commercial bodies four amendments were incorporated, one concerning the character of construction of the mole; the second, concerning a modification of the plans so as to permit of a depth of 30 feet at low tide alongside of the mole and wharf; the third, better facilities for crossing the railroad tracks in the Stratton grant; the fourth, of great moment to Oakland industries, the right accorded them of switching privileges on the Southern Pacific mole.

The passage of this ordinance brings with it the recognition by the Southern Pacific Company of Oakland's full and complete wharfing-out rights. If this franchise is granted to the Southern Pacific Company it is giving them the right to use and improve a portion, only, of the waterfront, reserving to the city, with rights of approach, a frontage three times larger that may be used by the municipality or leased to other competing corporations.

The city government in its dealings with the Southern Pacific has at all times stood first and foremost for the interests of the Oakland of today and of tomorrow, but it has also striven to be just to the rights of the Southern Pacific, realizing that a city can neither be developed without capital nor without a just government which regards the fundamental rights of all interests that make for its up-building.

An amendment was proposed and passed to print by the Oakland city council on Monday evening which is of importance in two material points.

First—It prevents discrimination by the Southern Pacific Company against Oakland in favor of San Francisco, a discrimination which has heretofore existed.

Secondly—It prevents discrimination by the Southern Pacific Company, in giving preferential rates to and from their own dock on all merchandise to and from interior points. We deem this latter feature of great importance as, if this franchise had been adopted without this amendment it would have resulted in the anomalous position of the city of Oakland building expensive municipal docks for local business alone, while at the same time granting unrestricted wharfing privileges to the Southern Pacific Company, permitting a monopoly by the Southern Pacific Company of all through business.

During Mrs. Fiske's engagement of one month at the Grand opera house, Chicago, beginning tomorrow evening, she will add two new plays to her repertoire. For the third week of the engagement J. M. Synge's one-act Irish play, "The Shadow of the Glen," will be used in conjunction with a new comedy by Harry James Smith. In the comedy Mrs. Fiske will appear. She will not be in the Synge play.

Miss Mary C. Aldrich is the manager of a construction company in Indianapolis and employs about 100 men during the paving season. She reports that all the men with whom she comes in contact in her business, city officials, material men, contractors, property owners and her own employees, are always courteous and polite. She thinks that if they make any difference between her and men occupying positions similar to hers it is in her favor.

Mrs. Perry Starkweather has four women assistants in her work as assistant labor commissioner of Minnesota. Mrs. Starkweather is the only woman in the country holding such an office and Minnesota is the only state in the union that has a department for women and children in its bureau of labor. This department is a sort of clearing house for all matters pertaining to women and children, industry and school. At present special attention is being given to the home conditions.

MARSHALL BLACK

A STATE SENATOR WHO HAS MADE GOOD
By FRANKLIN HICHBORN

At Sacramento, during the last session of the legislature, it was well said of Senator Marshall Black, of Santa Clara county, that, although he was weighed down with "appropriation bills," he managed to keep himself free from entangling alliances with the machine element.

The "appropriation bill" proposition is, by the way, about the heaviest handicap that can be put upon a member of the legislature who would serve his state rather than the "interests" which have heretofore dominated the California legislature.

By a curious custom, members of the legislature are held responsible for bills making appropriations for the maintenance and upkeep of the state institutions within their districts. The constituents at home expect—nay, demand—that these appropriations be sufficient. The machine element, by control of committees, has been able to control such appropriations.

Thus the member with appropriation bills has been forced into supporting machine measures, or else see his appropriation bills "cut all to pieces" by machine-controlled committees.

The average member has heretofore preferred to make his peace with the machine, rather than lose appropriations and face the wrath of his constituents.

Senator Black is generously blessed—or cursed—with state institutions. In his county are located the San Jose State Normal School and the Agnew State Hospital for the Insane. These institutions require large biennial appropriations. Then again, in 1906, came the great earthquake which played havoc with the buildings of both institutions. To repair the damage, appropriations totaling upwards of $1,000,000 were required. As a matter of fact, Del Norte and San Diego counties were as much interested in the rehabilitation of the two institutions as Santa Clara county. But the appropriation bills were charged to Senator Black and his colleagues from Santa Clara.

A less tactful man would have found himself held fast in the clutch of the machine. But not so Black. His record for 1907, when his extraordinary appropriation bills were pending, shows him smashing the machine at every point where a smash counted for something.

Of the eighteen test votes taken in the senate that session, Black is recorded as voting fourteen times against machine policies, once absent, and as voting three times for machine policies. Only four senators, Bell, Caminetti, Boynton and Mattos, that session, made a better record than he.

The test votes as set forth in legislative tables which have been prepared from the Senate Journal of 1907, are based on actual contests between the machine and anti-machine forces of senate and assembly, when some vital issue was under consideration. It would be vain to call a unanimous vote a test vote, or a vote where the members did not know what they were voting upon, or a vote where some motion involving no vital principle was disposed of. The test vote disposes, one way or the other, of a question that means something and over which there has been sharp division between the machine and the anti-machine members.

On such votes, at the session of 1907, Marshall Black stood fifth in the list of the forty members of the senate. This 1907 table of senate votes has never been published as a whole, although the writer has given parts of it what publicity he could. Of Senator Black's record, as set forth in the 1907 table, it is enough to say that he voted to give the electors of this state opportunity to cast a state-wide vote to express their choice for United States senator; that he voted for the Stetson direct primary bill, for the resolutions to force publicity of sales of jute bags made at San Quentin prison, for the initiative and referendum, for the anti-prize fight bill, for the constitutional amendment to limit the amount paid legislative attaches. Senator Black voted against the notorious change of venue bill, and, at the final vote, against the equally notorious "four-track" bill, a measure well calculated to tighten the grip of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company upon the state.

The three "bad votes" against Black's record at the session of 1907 were reduced to two when he voted against the so-called four-track bill. On an early roll call, he is reported as voting for that bill, which is recorded against him. But at the final vote, the one which counted, he voted against the bill.

One of the two remaining "bad votes" was, against the so-called "jury verdicts" bill, a measure, by the way, which in 1909, Black supported, voted for and helped to pass. The third vote against him—and the only serious mistake for the session—was his vote against the reciprocal demurrage bill. However, at the session of 1909, Black was found on the side of the advocates of this measure.

SENATOR MARSHALL BLACK

Black's record for 1909 was even better than his record for 1907.

Of the sixteen test votes taken in the senate at the session of 1909, Senator Black is recorded as voting eleven times against machine policies, once for machine policies, and as four times absent.

Senator Black's absent marks are accounted for by his serious illness which took him from Sacramento during the closing days of the session. Up to the time that he had to take to his bed, Senator Black answered to every roll call where a test issue was involved and with one exception, answered on the right side.

The one "bad vote" recorded against Senator Black was on the measure which provided that the "party circle" should be eliminated from the election ballot. Senator Black voted against this bill when it was first considered in the senate. But when the measure came up on a motion to reconsider, Senator Black corrected his mistake and went on record for it. Senator Black, therefore, on the sixteen test votes by which the members of the state senate of 1909 have been measured, has a practically clear record.

Senator Black voted against the machine's amendments intended by the machine to make the direct primary bill ineffective, he voted for the Walker-Otis anti-race track gambling bill, for the effective Stetson railroad regulation bill, for the initiative amendment, for the local option bill and for the Stanford bill.

Curiously enough, Black's votes for these two last named and most meritorious measures, are responsible for the principal opposition toward his re-election.

The "liquor interests," be it understood, keep tab on members of legislative bodies who vote for local option, black-list them, and labor viciously—with liberal expenditures of money—to brush them from public life. The "liquor interests" are opposed to Senator Black's re-election.

But Black's support of the Stanford bill gave them even greater offense than did his vote on the local option measure.

The Stanford bill prohibits the sale of intoxicants within a mile and a half of a university. It was aimed at the low groggeries at Menlo Park, in which many a Stanford student has taken his first plunge downward. The "Liquor Interests" as represented by the Royal Arch and kindred bodies, maintained a lobby at Sacramento to defeat the measure.

Senator Black was the author of the bill, he worked for it, fought for it and compelled its passage. It is now the law of the state. The "liquor interests" have not forgotten. With their political following of tenderloin, parasite and saloon bum, the "liquor interests" are out to defeat Senator Black.

At the primaries, Black was defeated in the San Jose tenderloin precincts overwhelmingly. But the orchardists and farmers of the country districts understood the situation, and gave him a five to one vote, overcoming the tenderloin.

And the solid reputable element of Santa Clara county orchard and farm homes that nominated him, will re-elect Senator Black to the legislature, where he has served his district and his state faithfully and ably.
